The early morning meetings are said by old-time workers, "to determine the pulse of the whole camp-meeting." When people are sufficiently interested to attend two meetings before breakfast, and one immediately after, the enthusiasm is thought to be at a proper height, and the rest of the day must necessarily be successful. The Auditorium bell rang every morning at 5.45, for the Consecration Service—a simple outpouring of praise and petition, as joyous as the singing of birds. The venerable Dr. A. E. Ballard, Vice-President of the Association, was the leader, as he has been for years. At 6.45, the bell would ring again, and crowds hurried over to the Auditorium for family devotions. When these were over, there was the breakfast recess until 9 o'clock, when three meetings were held at once, all largely attended. The Young People's Meetings have outgrown the Temple, and a larger edifice may be erected in the near future. The Tabernacle also proved much too small for the crowds who desired to attend the Holiness Meeting. Here Bishop Fitzgerald, Dr. Ballard, Dr. J. H. Alday, Mrs. Margaret Bottome, and Mrs. Carrie Smith, made a strong array of platform talent. At the Helping Hand Meeting, especially for the unconverted and backsliders, scores knelt around the altar, and strong men wept like children as they felt the power of God's saving grace.

Mrs. Lizzie Smith's evangelistical services at 1:30, which she has held for twenty-eight years, were well attended. At four o'clock there was a special daily meeting for mothers, and another for children. The evangelistic sermon and Bible reading conducted by Rev. Joseph Smith, of California, awakened many of the unconverted.

On the last Sabbath, August 30, the great Love Feast was held. It began at nine o'clock A. M. The other services were merged into this, and it was an occasion long to be remembered. Gray-haired soldiers of the Cross, seventy and eighty years old, told of their victories and their sure hope of everlasting life, amid shouts of "glory" and "hallelujah." Men and women in life's prime, old, young and middle-aged, testified to the goodness of God and the joy and peace of religion. Some spoke in Bible metaphor, others in home-spun phrases. Some started hymns. Tears were in some eyes, smiles on the faces of others.

The afternoon evangelistic service in the Temple was crowded, as was the Twilight Service. The beach meeting could not take place on account of the severe storm, but the pelting rain could not abate the zeal of these camp-meeting workers, and in the evening the Auditorium was crowded again for the last preaching service of the camp. The Rev. Joseph H. Smith, of California, the evangelist, delivered a forcible evangelistic sermon. At its close many knelt about the altar. It was nearly eleven o'clock before the meeting came to an end.

Next day as the rain ceased, the good people had their annual closing camp-meeting march around the grounds. The officers of the Association, the orchestra and choir headed the procession. After the return to the Auditorium, Bishop Fitzgerald offered a prayer, and declared the camp-meeting of 1903 closed "in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost," and the Auditorium bell gave three strokes.

GOING TO THE EARLY MORNING SERVICE AT OCEAN GROVE

At one of the meetings an instance of a remarkable answer to prayer was related by a minister. He said that at a revival service one evening in a church where he preached, a mother knelt at the altar and prayed for her dissipated son. "Oh, God," she cried, "save him! You know where he is; you are able to save him." Such was her earnestness and soul agony, that the minister said to a friend near, "Something must come of this," and he looked at his watch, and found it was ten minutes to nine o'clock. On the next evening, when the invitation was given for sinners to come forward, that dissipated son knelt at the altar at the same place where his mother had knelt and prayed the evening previous, and he was converted. The minister wanted to know how it happened that he came to the church? The young man replied, "I am a hardened, wicked sinner. Last evening I was going off on my usual spree when something stopped me. I don't know what it was, but I walked the streets all night under the conviction of sin. I learned that a revival meeting was being held in this church. I came to the church early and waited for the door to open, and was the very first one to enter." "What time was it last evening?" asked the minister, "that you felt there was something that changed your course?"

He replied it was "ten minutes to nine o'clock." That mother's prayers had its effect.

Our Household Circle

Barbara's Lawn-Party

LAWN-PARTIES had been the order of the day in Cliffdale. Mrs. Squires, who had a great expanse of green sward, dotted with trees and gay with beds of brilliant flowers, had been first to the fashion for the season. Bessie and Katharine Squires were at home from their Freshman year in college, and, naturally, there was a rally of the younger ones at their fete. They had tennis and croquet; boats to accommodate those who wanted to row on the river, and a band that discoursed sweet music at intervals from the vine-screened south end of the veranda. Mrs. Squires gave the next party from four to seven, on a summer's day, in honor of her visiting cousin, a lady from Boston. Here young matrons predominated, and the husbands appeared one by one when trains brought business people home from town. Other lawn parties succeeded these, each with its brightness of coloring; its peculiar form of pleasing entertainment; its rugs spread on the velvet turf; its small tables for refreshments, and its dainty bill of fare. One mother had a birthday party on the lawn for a pair of twins, aged four, and this included every baby who could toddle, and was, on the whole, the liveliest party of all.

Barbara Mace had been a guest at every lawn-party of the summer, and, indeed, wherever there was anything afoot there you might count on meeting Barbara. She was not a girl, but she was not old. She had no wonderful flower of beauty, but her vivid, dark face, sparkling eyes, and ready smile, had a charm beyond mere beauty. Barbara never seemed to be making an effort, or to be leaving an impression, yet she brought sunshine and sweetness with her, by her grace, tact, and real unselfishness, and nothing was complete without her. To Cliffdale, she had come, a stranger, in quest of rest and country food and air, as far back as early April. Now, in September, every one knew her, and she bore in the conservative old village the sway, and exercised the influence of a person whom they had known in that vicinage all their lives. Could Barbara have shown them her precious city home, and introduced them to her wide circle of city friends, the people of Cliffdale would have realized that there, too, she was a social queen.

The tree-toads were singing in the lingering twilight; birds were dropping now and then a single sleepy note, and summer visitors were packing their trunks to go home, when Barbara Mace, coming back from a long camp in the woods, talked over the past weeks and their joys, with her devoted admirers, Bessie and Katharine Squires.

"Yes," said the latter, "it's all been lovely, but I'm rather relieved that it's over. Cliffdale will now resume its normal condition, and it will be rather pleasant to have a breathing-spell, before we go back to Vassar."

"Breathing-spell!" Bess lifted up her hands in amazement. "Why sister dear, we have the dentist, and the dressmaker, and the seamstress, and shopping in prospect, and simply no end of things to do. I expect we'll be rushed from now to the last day."

"We ought to have another lawn-party, girls," said Barbara, positively.

The girls opened their eyes and stared at her.

"Another! Who would come to it?" cried Bessie.

"I shall be hostess," said Barbara, again with conviction as who should say, "Here is a duty I cannot shirk!"

"Where do you purpose having your party, Barbara?" inquired Katharine.

"In Mr. Allaire's apple orchard. I'm sure he'll lend it for the purpose."

The girls waited for further information. Barbara, as they seated themselves beside her in the arbor where there was so beautiful a view of the sunset, was ready to gratify their curiosity. They had been tramping over the hills, and their hands were full of spoil—mosses, vines, flowers. Their cheeks were flushed with health, their eyes were shining. All three young women were pictures of vigor and might have posed to an artist who wanted to put on canvas his idea of the joy of life. To each of them just to be living was bliss.

As they sat on one of the arbor seats, three girls of their own age passed, sauntering down the path, on their way to the shore of the river. Bessie nodded carelessly.

"How tired they look!" she observed.

Tired they did indeed look, Mrs. Squires' Maggie, Mrs. Parks' Susan, Mrs. Wilmer's Norah. All three had been broiling over stoves, and working in steaming laundries for many weeks. Their share of the summer had been to serve others in humble ministry.

They had been well paid, but their labor had been unremitting. Mr. Wilmer usually reached home so late that Norah seldom had an evening. The Parks' household had been continually augmented by company, and Susan had felt worn out for weeks. As for Maggie, in. Barbara went about in person giving her invitations, and everywhere she left a trail of pleased excitement behind her.

"The saints bless her swate face," exclaimed Maggie at the Squires', and the sentiment was echoed everywhere else. Barbara's scheme met enthusiastic general approval.

She went about among the girls she knew and pressed into service those who had particular accomplishments, and she did not omit a lad or two, who might have something to contribute.

"The guests of the day will wish to rest," she said, "but they will also want to be amused."

So Tim Squires was asked to give a solo on his banjo, and Lucy Halsted performed on the harp, and Bessie Squires was put on the programme for a recitation. The soft rugs and the easy chairs and rockers, the little tables, and the pretty tea equipages, were taken to the Allaire orchard. Never were sandwiches more delicately made, nor was chocolate more beautifully frothed and crowned with whipped cream till every cup was ambrosial, while the fragrance of the freshly-made tea was like incense.

"There are women here who brew their tea for an hour," said Barbara, steeping her leaves for just two minutes in the merrily boiling water. "I have known them to 'wet the tea,' as they called it, at four o'clock for a six o'clock supper. Two hours beforehand that was. It was concentrated bitterness, as you may fancy."

Tea and chocolate, buns, dainty biscuits, scones, sandwiches and cake, with ice cream at the end of the fete, made a repast that was fit for any one on earth. The guests enjoyed it, and enjoyed the music and the fun and all the merry-making. On only one point, they took a firm stand.

"We'll help you clear it up, Miss Barbara," they said.

"We will, indeed, Barbara dear," added Mrs. Allaire, whose house was full of boarders from garret to cellar.

"Indeed, and you will not," was Barbara's answer. "You are to go home properly from my party, and never mind the clearing away."

She had her own views and she carried them out. The youths and maidens were there to lend a hand, and possibly some of them gained a notion hitherto unknown of the number of steps, the number of dishes, and the number of separate individual hindrances that always go to the clearing away of a meal, to say nothing of the work there is in getting one ready. Barbara's lawn-party was the capsheaf of the Cliffdale season.

Heroism Among Children

Twice in one week lately the great newspapers that lie on New York breakfast-tables and are read by people on trains and in towns, four or five hours away from New York, almost as early, told stories of childish heroism. Once it was a child of three years old, who tried to save his playmate not much older, when both had fallen into the swift current of the river. Once it was a little fellow of eleven, who plunged into the river to help a brother of seven. The little heroes both lost their lives, but how green and fair will be their memories forever. How much they have escaped of earthly soil and sin and shame! How beautiful was the impulse that made heroes of little ones yet in early childhood!

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—H. H. Had you sent your felicitations and wishes I would have replied by mail with pleasure. As the bride's mother of a future wedding, you will receive the guests in the gay, as before the bride and groom and their little procession come in. Smile pleasantly on them as they arrive. Certainly you must be the first to congratulate your daughter and her husband after the ceremony. Your omission to do this would be remarked. Step up to the pair, kiss your daughter, and shake hands with the bridegroom, saying any loving word of good cheer you can think of. "I hope you will be very happy," will answer every requirement. I am sure you will not cry. That would never do.

Inter'l S. S. Lesson for Sept. 27

"BOW DOWN THY EAR, O LORD: HEAR ME, FOR I AM POOR AND NEEDY." PS. 86: 1.

GOLDEN TEXT:

"The Lord is my Light and my salvation"

PSALM 27: 1

SAMUEL'S home was at Ramah. There a large company of the elders of Israel came together to demand of Samuel a King for Israel, on the ground that Samuel had grown old, and had placed national affairs in the hands of his sons, who did not have the confidence of the people, because of their wickedness, one of many cases where the sins of sons has brought sorrow and harm to their parents, to themselves, and to their country.

II. Samuel laid the matter before God. Having received divine instructions to allow a king to be chosen under protest, he assembled the whole people together at Mizpah, a hill near Ramah, five miles from Jerusalem. Then a God-directed lot was taken, and Saul, of the tribe of Benjamin, was taken. He was young, not above forty; of noble bearing, being head and shoulders above all others of the people; yet he was not proud, for when he heard that greatness was to be thrust upon him, he hid himself, and had to be sought and brought out to stand before the people as their king.

III. Shortly after the crowning of Saul, Samuel called together, at Gilgal, a great plain near Jericho, another great national gathering, that he might deliver his farewell address as judge—the accession of a king having rendered this office unnecessary. On this occasion Samuel reviewed his official relation to the people, and challenged them to produce any evidence that he had dealt otherwise than fairly with them. He wanted to quit with a clean balance sheet. The people gave universal testimony that he had indeed been a righteous judge.

IV. Ten years and more have passed, and Samuel is at Gilgal, again to meet King Saul, who has just returned from battle with the Amalekites. Saul, in camp, meets Samuel with the salutation, "Blessed be thou of the Lord; I have performed the commandment of the Lord." It was a lie, for he had performed only so much as suited his desires. God had told him to slay all of the Amakelites and their cattle, but he had spared Agag, the king, and he had brought into his camp the fattest sheep and cattle. In the name of God, Samuel pronounces doom upon King Saul for his disobedience, and slays Agag.

V. After the rejection of Saul, Samuel retired to Ramah and mourned over the king's downfall. God called Samuel back to duty by sending him to Bethlehem to anoint one of the sons of Jesse to be king in Saul's place. David, young, and devout, was selected by God's direction. He was anointed by Samuel, and returned to his duties as a shepherd until such a time as God should have need of him.

VI. The anointing of David was the first chapter of his kingship; the second chapter was his victorious encounter with Goliath, and the consequent defeat of the whole Philistine army. These events brought him before the people, gave him great praise at the expense of King Saul, with whom they compared him. Thus was the bitter jealousy of Saul aroused, and he began to recognize in David the king who should in time reign in his place.

VII. After David's victory over Goliath, he became one of the king's officers and lived in the palace at Gibeah. It was a part of his duty to play upon the harp to solace the spirit of the mad king, who had spells of madness. Thrice, in fits of frenzy, Saul tried to take the life of David by casting his javelin at him, but David avoided the weapon and escaped.

VIII. David had a friend at court in Jonathan, the son of King Saul. Jonathan had just seen David when Abner, the commander-in-chief, brought him in to stand before King Saul with the head of Goliath in his hand. Jonathan's admiration for David was so great that he then took off his princely garments, even to his richly embroidered girdle, and clothed David with them, and he gave David his bow and sword. David and Jonathan entered into a covenant before the Lord to be friends forever. Saul was so angered at Jonathan for seeking to save David's life that he threw his javelin at his own son. After this incident David was warned by Jonathan that it was not safe for him to continue dwelling in or near the palace, and David became a refugee among the hills and caves. But even there he found joy in God, as in Persia fresh water is brought from the depths of the sea.

IX. Six hundred men joined David and became his body guard. They were expert in war, being able to use the bow or the sling with either the left or right hand. David and his men were continually on the watch for Saul, who had an organized army of three thousand picked men, led by himself in pursuit of David. Once Saul came into the very cave where David was in hiding, and laid down to sleep. David might easily have killed Saul, but he only cut off a piece of Saul's robe to prove his magnanimity. On yet another occasion David found Saul asleep, surrounded by his soldiers, and again spared him, but brought away evidences of his mercy. For the moment Saul was overcome with David's generous treatment, and promised to cease his murderous pursuit.

X. Saul and his whole force of warriors, were face to face with the great army of the Philistines in the plain of Esdraelon. Saul was in despair for two reasons; first, because of the superior force and equipment of the Philistines, particularly the chariots of iron and horses; and, second, because he felt himself cut off from God's help, for he could get no answers to his prayers. He sought counsel from the witch of Endor and was greatly discomfited by what he saw and heard. The battle went hard against him, and he was driven up the heights of Mt. Gilboa, where his three sons perished, and Saul himself committed suicide rather than fall into the hands of the Philistines. When word was brought to David that Saul and Jonathan were dead, he mourned greatly, and ordered a public fast.

However the battle is ended,
Though proudly the victor comes
With fluttering flags and prancing nags
And echoing roll of drums,
Still truth proclaims this motto
In letters of living light—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

Though the heel of the strong oppressor
May grind the weak in the dust,
And the voices of fame with one acclaim
May call him great and just,
Let those who applaud take warning
And keep this motto in sight—
No question is ever settled
Until it is settled right.

After the death of Saul, God directed David to go to Hebron to be crowned king. His faithful band of 600 accompanied him. The elders and warriors of Judah came also, and they crowned David. His first act as king was to send a blessing to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, who had rescued the bodies of Saul and his sons from the Philistines, and given them friendly burial. At Mahanaim, about forty miles from Hebron, a rival king was set up, a son of Saul named Ishbosheth. He reigned only two years, and met a violent death at the hands of his own servants. David was then crowned king of all Israel in the city of Jerusalem. The coronation feast lasted three days, and was a time of great rejoicing.

David's Development

The preceding abridgements may serve for those who wish to review the quarter lesson by lesson, but a more effective way will be to consider only the central movement of the quarter—David's steps to the throne, with some effective contrasts of good and evil made by comparing his course with that of Saul. A fitting golden text for this first period in David's history, from anointing to coronation, would be, "Rest i the Lord, wait patiently f him, and he shall give thee th desires of thine heart." O this day, it is well to put gre emphasis on the fact that th true rest depends more on th soul than on the body, an that the art of resting in th yoke, to which Christ invite should be learned by all Chri tians, many of them wearied b the very efforts they have mad to secure rest by outwar change alone. "Return, m soul, unto thy Noah." Th last word means rest, and th reference is to the dove tha flew from the Ark across th waters, seeking rest in vai only to return wearied to res again in the Ark—a picture o many a summer wanderer wh has found no real rest upon o beside the sea because his heart was not at peace. "Com unto me," said Christ, "and I will rest you." David, thoug for ten years almost constantly at war, had been all the whil inwardly at peace though pursued like a hunted deer by Sau and ever on the move he had been inwardly at rest.

Rest is not quitting the busy career
Rest is the fitting of self to one's sphere.

Rest depends chiefly on right relations, first with God second with our fellow-men, secured by obedience to th two commands, that embrace the two hemispheres of a well rounded life, "Thou shalt love God, thou shalt love man. We are brought into right relations with God by the Saviour ship of Jesus, and into right relations with man by the King ship of Christ.

"Wait patiently for him" is only the poet's way of sayin over again "Rest in the Lord." Modern wisdom out o many biographies has made the equivalent proverb, "Every thing comes to him who waits." "Commit thy way unto th Lord, trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass."

At Bahrin, on the Persian Gulf, little or no rain falls, an the arid shore has no fresh water; but there are spring which burst forth from the bottom of the gulf hard by. Thi fresh water is obtained by diving. With a goatskin bag th diver, holding a heavy stone to sink him, plunges to the bot tom, opens his bag over the mouth of the spring, then drop the stone, and rises to the surface. The source of thes springs is thought to be in the green hills of Osman, six hun dred miles away. So David, beneath the waves of sorrow found the water of life.

A young fellow traveling in a coach to London attempte to ridicule the Scriptures, and particularly made himsel merry with the story of David and Goliath, strongly urging the impossibility of a youth like David being able to throw a stone with sufficient force to sink into the giant's fore head. On this he appealed to a grave Quaker, who sat ir one corner. "Indeed, friend," he replied, "I do not think it at all improbable if the Philistine's head was as soft as thine."

If loving hearts were never lonely,
If all things wished might always be,
Accepting what they looked for only,
They might be glad, but not in Thee.

We need as much the cross we bear
As air we breathe, as light we see;
It draws us to Thy side in prayer,
It bends us to our strength in Thee.
—ANNA L. WARING.

We can see that all David's trials were but part of his training to be a king, not of Israel only, but of the whole world of song.

All God's nightingales have learned to sing,
Pressing the bosom on some secret thorn.

David's psalms came from his heart, and have gone to more hearts with helpfulness than the songs of any other man.

He who finds the path by which
The heart-aches come and go,
Who speaks the sympathetic word
That lightens human woe,
Will aye be loved by those who feel
His tenderness about them steal;
From him they care not to conceal
The tears that fain would start.
I'm glad I know the door that leads Into the human heart.

We might well devote the Review to-day to the consecration of our voices, with illustrations from David's psalms and kindred songs.

Oh! Singer of to-day, this glorious hour
Is all for you and me—what shall it give
To us, and ask of fate—what splendid power
In brain and hand, what glorious right to live
Among our fellows, and to war with sin?
What quickening of the pulse as we aspire
To claim our right, and risk earth's joys to win,
To conquer self, and force it through the fire!
Give us this force, dear God, and ever more
Give us a deepening love of all our fellow men;
Give us new insight—courage to explore
With all the tenderness of human ken,
The loveliest heart that beats in human kind,
Its glory and its soul to seek and find!

"I WILL SING A NEW SONG UNTO THEE, O GOD." PS. 144: 9.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS."

CHAPTER V.—Continued

"We can't send this out, Quits!" Douglas said in despair, as the press groaned, it seemed to him protesting against such a travesty of typographical labor. "It will be the laughing stock of all Anderson county."

Quits ran his grimy fingers through his disordered hair and smiled in his slow fashion.

George's spirits, however, had been rising with every turn of the handle.

"Mr. Douglas, don't you believe no such story. This edition of the Beacon will keep the people guessing. The whole thing's just like these puzzle pictures. Find the thought in the editorial?' 'Find the end of the lines in the last column?' See! The people will get no end of fun out of it. Don't let's let Coleman have the laugh on us. We'll show 'em we can get out something as long as the old press was a cog left in her."

Douglas laughed. "It will be something, that's sure. Well it's the best we can do. But I expect to hear from it in various ways."

It would have astonished the editor of the Beacon if he could have foreseen that evening the number of ways he was destined to hear from that unique edition of the paper. There was nothing else talked about in Anderson county for a whole week. The story about Rice & Co., and the Mayor leaked out in spite of the inability of Douglas' subscribers to read his explanation. Mr. Edwards was not at all slow about spreading the facts as he knew them. Copies of that week's Beacon strayed as far as Clinton, and some of the New York dailies managed to get a look at the paper, and commented on the young western editor's pluck.

To his astonishment requests began to come in for extra copies. People wanted them for souvenirs.

"When it comes to souvenirs, my boy," Mr. Edwards said, when Douglas related this event, "people are simply crazy. They will take anything from a strand of rope that hanged the biggest scoundrel in the universe to the tags on an opera singer's steamer trunk. But there is no question about the Beacon being a rare article. For a piece or for pieces of journalism, I think it can be truthfully said to be all by itself."

But Douglas had not yet begun to hear from the paper in the most important way for him. Three days after the "Meat-market edition" as George called it, had been sent out, Douglas was seated at his desk, relieved over the prospect of paper for that week's issue, secured for him through Mr. Edwards' efforts with a firm in Bergen. The Bergen company happened to have a quantity of somewhat inferior paper in stock and was glad to dispose of it. It was not the regular newspaper stock, but after his experience with the wrapping paper, almost anything seemed an improvement on that.

Douglas was busy going over his mail, which had been largely increased by the effect of the Beacon's issue, when he was interrupted by a man who came in abruptly and coming up close to his desk, said without any preliminary remarks:

"Are you Mr. Douglas, the editor of the Beacon?"

"Yes."

"Can I have a few words with you?" the man asked.

"I'm very busy—" Douglas began, but his visitor simply said, "I can state my errand without sitting down or taking off my hat. My name is Sage—Cyrus R. Sage. I live on a farm about twelve miles north of Colby. I've been thinking and reading and praying over this whole cursed liquor business ever since I was big enough to have pockets to my clothes. I've taken the Beacon and read it since you came here. I've had every number, and a part of a sentence in this last number sent me in here to have a little talk with you."

The man drew a copy of the "Meat-market edition" out of his pocket, and began to read.

"The temperance cause needs"—(word gone here) "in country, as well as city. The saloon"—(blank) "recruits from the boys—farms. (Can't read next line.) Investigation shows that more than half the boys who help to keep the saloon alive are from the country. This is enough to prove the necessity" (word gone here) "instruction ought to be going on, agitation, education, facts show almost no effort being made in the country to train young"—(rest of the editorial is wanting.)

"Did you write that?" the man asked as he folded up the paper and put it back into his pocket.

"I did. And I'm sorry you had to work your passage through it."

"That's all right young man; I'm used to working. It is my habit. But now not to take up your time, I want you to write a temperance story for me."

"What!" Douglas exclaimed, thinking the man must be crazy. And then he gave him more careful attention.

He might have been anywhere from forty-five to fifty years of age. He was dressed in very plain working clothes, which had the stain of the soil on them. His boots were very rusty, and his hat, which he had not removed, looked as if it had passed through a threshing machine and then been used as a target for a shot-gun. The face under the hat was covered with a stubble of beard, and was one of the most rugged, tanned, weather-beaten faces Douglas had ever seen. The eyes were clear, steady gray eyes, that might look with equal indifference into the muzzle of a gun or a corn-sheller.

"You want me to write a temperance story?" Douglas said, with a slight smile. "What for?"

"For me. Your editorial, what I could read of it, set me thinking. We've got seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson Township. They're chock-full of children, and children are just the material to make prohibitionists. You know as well as I do that this State is going to have a great old tussle with the saloon one of these days and get away from the local option laws to a State enactment. Now it struck me the farmers will have to do their share. I'm ready to do mine. I've got seven boys growing up, and the saloon will do its best to get my boys away from me. Their mother and me don't intend to let the saloon get 'em if we can help it. Of course, the whisky business cares no more than the devil for fathers and mothers and their boys. But my idea is this: Gather all these Sunday Schools together into one union gathering and have a temperance picnic. There's a grove on my ranch, and they can meet there. My idea is to furnish two or three good speakers, have the schools work up temperance songs, and offer prizes, perhaps, for temperance declamations or debates. But a temperance story, to be read by a couple of pretty girls (and we've got loads of them in Payson Township), seems to me would make a great hit. One chapter read in the forenoon, say. Then have a good lunch and offer every Sunday School scholar a dish of ice cream free, and then the second chapter after lunch, with some more songs and temperance talks. How does that strike you?"

Douglas said to himself, "This farmer is not crazy at all. He's one of the smartest men I ever met." Out loud, he said, "It's a capital idea, Mr. Sage. I'll be ready to help in any way I can."

"All right. Just give me a temperance story for the picnic. Then come out and hear it read."

"But I never wrote a story in my life. I don't——"

"Aren't you a college man?"

"Yes, but——"

"I thought a college man could write anything," said Mr. Sage, and Douglas looking at him could not tell whether he was in earnest or not.

"But a story is out of my line, Mr. Sage. I never wrote one in my life."

"Maybe you know some one who could write one here in Colby. I've heard the new High School teacher is a mighty smart girl. What's her name?"

"Miss Harris."

"Maybe you know her. Maybe she'd try her hand at a story. Would you ask her?"

"I might," replied Douglas slowly.

"Maybe between you you might work up a story. She could write the first chapter, and you write the second. Then you would have a start and——"

"I'll think it over," Douglas laughed. "But I tell you it's something I never did in all my life."

"I wish you would," Mr. Sage said wistfully. "There was Clara Lane's boy lived out near us, the boy who was killed here just 'fore election. Why couldn't you use that incident in the story somewhere?"

"We might," Douglas stared at the farmer, and a strange tingling went over him as there flashed through his mind the dramatic possibilities of such a story.

"Well, Mr. Douglas, let me know if you decide to try the story, you and the schoolma'am. Anyhow the temperance picnic's a go. I'll plan to have it in July. You are invited now. Come out and bring some nice girl with you. It's a pleasant drive. Maybe the schoolma'am would come with you."

"Maybe she would," Douglas answered smiling.

Mr. Sage started out.

"I'm much obliged for the time you've given me. Any free advertising you can give the picnic will be appreciated."

"I'll be glad to help in that way. And how about inviting some of the business men out. Do you know Mr. Edwards?"

"Guess I do. He and I were in the same army corps."

"How would you like to have them come out with me?"

"First rate. Edwards wouldn't be bad for one of the speakers."

"Then there's Mr. Vernon of the First Methodist. Better get him too."

"We've heard of him. Thank you for these suggestions. I'll see him about it."

Farmer Sage went out and all the rest of the day Douglas brooded over the story idea.

In the evening he went up to the Edwards' to talk the matter over with Esther, who had come back to Colby the day before.

"But I never wrote a story, either," Esther said, when Douglas suggested the farmer's idea of a composite authorship.

"Nothing like trying. Mr. Edwards said: 'Begin on it and if you get stuck just marry off the characters and don't know what to do with or else get them killed.' I never wrote a story in my life, but I believe I could get the people into plenty of trouble and then have some handy explosion or sickness close to come in at the last minute and remove all the embarrassing complications."

Douglas spoke of the Lane tragedy, and told of the thrill he had been feeling all day at the thought of its possibility for dramatic treatment.

"I'm sure you could make a beginning with it, Esther," Mrs. Edwards said, encouragingly. "And it would certainly be a novelty that would draw people to the picnic. Mr. Douglas is getting to be quite well known in the county, and this plan of Mr. Sage's is certainly fine in every way."

Before the evening was over, Esther had reluctantly consented to try writing the first chapter of the Temperance Story and Douglas agreed to continue it. They all talked over the farmer's idea, and the longer they discussed it, the greater its possibilities seemed.

"Of course you and Mrs. Edwards will plan to drive out to the picnic when it comes off," Douglas said, as he was leaving.

"All right?" said Edwards, winking at Mrs. Edwards, "You and Esther can speak for the back seat now."

"I hope we won't have to take any back seat when it comes to this story," Douglas answered, while Esther blushed and looked prettier than ever.

"I believe I can write something," she said with a great deal of spirit.

"You'll have to look out for your laurels, young man," said Edwards. "I believe in Chapter One, all right, but I have my honest doubts about the second."

"We'll see," was all that Douglas ventured to reply, but as he went out, he grew every moment more and more roused over the idea, and found himself during the next few weeks almost impatient for Esther to finish her part, so that he might begin on his own.

Two weeks after the incident of Mr. Sage's visit, George came in one evening after supper, and exclaimed as he pulled off his coat and started in to fix the press for some special job work: "Heard the news about the Sentinel?"

Quits was making up forms and Douglas was helping him. Both looked up, but neither spoke.

"They're having the time of their lives at the Sentinel with them linotype machines. Yesterday one of 'em went broke, and there ain't nobody in the office knows how to fix it, and to-day, the other one fell down, and the whole force is monkeyin' round it with cold chisels and wrenches and swear words, and the ink on the rollers is blue instead of black, on account of the atmosphere."

"They've got the Hattersley machines, Mr. Douglas," Quits said, in answer to a questioning look. "He got the machine out in 1857, and it's not bad when everything is all right, but when they get to acting up, the inventor himself don't know sometimes what ails it. I know, because I worked for two years in the factory where they were made. But Bartlett made a great mistake when he got them for a country paper."

"He'll know how we felt two weeks ago," George chuckled. "He's long on paper, maybe, but he's mighty short on type. Wouldn't I like to ask Coleman how he feels to-night? It's dead sure they can't get the Sentinel out. The nearest expert is in New York."

Douglas went over to his desk. He was saying to himself, with a sort of fierce exultation, "I'm glad of it! I hope Bartlett will be at the greatest possible expense and have no end of trouble. I hate him!"

He started in to write something, but his thoughts did not come freely. He dropped his pencil, and stared at the little calendar pinned on the back of the desk. Then he tried to write again. But the only words he could think were the words, "I hate him!"

He sat staring at the calendar for another interval. Then he got up and went over to where Quits was working.

Did you say, Quits, that you understood the mechanism of the Hattersley typesetters?"

"Yes, Mr. Douglas, I understand them all right. I have helped to make them."

Douglas looked gravely at Quits before he put the next question.

HOME MISSIONS*

A Field for Christian Usefulness in Which Every Christian Can Work

MANY young people after being converted are stirred by the longing to go out to some heathen land to proclaim the Gospel. It is well that it should be so, for never has there been a time when the need of missionaries was so great, or the opportunities for missionary work so inviting. But for a large proportion of those eager aspirants for missionary service, circumstances personal or family, interpose an insurmountable obstacle. They cannot go; their noble ambition is balked and they keenly feel their enforced exclusion from the service. To all such another sphere no less needy and no less promising is open. There are heathens in all our cities who know next to nothing of Christ and Christianity, and a still larger number who do know, but have no personal, practical knowledge of their own interest in it. Every man and woman, every boy and girl, who has enrolled himself, or herself, under the banner of the Cross, can be employed in this field, and can help to sow the seed and perhaps reap the harvest of souls.

The field begins in the small circle of domestic and social relations. Is there in the young Christian's family or household, in the office, or store, or factory in which he is employed, one person who has not given his heart to Christ? Is there one who is leading a life of careless indifference to religion, ignorant of the blessing that religion would bring into his life? What better service could the young Christian do than to enlighten that one person and lead him to Christ?

Then there is the wider field of the Sunday School and the City Mission. There are children playing about the streets, poor, ragged and barefooted, in some cases, who might be gathered into a class and taught and rescued from a life of wickedness. There are missions in hard quarters of the cities where the City Missionary is having a discouraging task. If some young, energetic, devoted Christian would go to his help, giving an occasional address, or visiting some heathen home, how much help he might render!

Then there is the growing, increasing perplexing problem of the immigrants. They are coming here by tens of thousands, and settling all over the country. If they could be reached by the Christians near their homes, and be brought to accept Christianity and lead Christian lives, how great would be the blessing to them and to us.

ONE OF THE REAPERS

Dedicated to Rev. John G. Paton, D.D., Missionary to the South Sea Islands

THEY dwelt in loving confidence in a cot by the Scottish sea;
She looked into his eyes and said, "A secret I've for thee;
'Tis of a joy for which we both have yearned and prayed for long,
It fills my days with gladness and my heart with sweet new song;
Within my being, strong and deep, a love so wondrous lives;
For God, in answer to our prayer, a little child now gives.
"E'en now my thought grows strangely bold, in longing for the hour,
When I shall clasp the little one, and feel the mighty power
Of mother-love grown deep; how sweet to bear the child, to be thy wife,
The little child will teach me more the meaning of my life."
They knelt that night together, not to pray for gold nor land,
But even then, to give their child, to God's own loving hand,
To use for good to human kind. "Thou, Lord, mayst take thine own; [a loan.
For thine it is, not ours: to us, it is from thee
Then watch us, Lord, and give us grace to lead the child aright,
That, some day, unto heathen lands, he'll bear Thy Word of light."
To-day, that child of theirs, in power, walks by the Southern Sea,
Like the son of humble Hannah, teacher and judge is he; [above,
And angels o'er his reaping, sing praises from While the mother, watching it from heaven, is filled with thankful love.

SUNSHINE CLUBS ARE BUSY

YOU know the joy of receiving letters from friends. Often, no doubt, you have impatiently met the postman half way to find out if you have been remembered. Let us extend this happiness of receiving letters to those not favored with many friends.

Mrs. Romine Scott, of 726 Tenth street, N. E., Washington, D. C., is an invalid, who is confined to her wheel-chair for month after month. Her birthday will be on September 26, and how she treasures letters from Sunshiners. She and her old soldier husband read them over and over again and try to picture the faces of the writers. Won't you write her and tell her you wish her "good cheer" in the new year she is starting?

Birthday letter-parties are true sunshine to many invalids who cannot get out, or who cannot receive their friends in their own homes. Miss Sallie Dickinson, president of the Sunshine Lodge at Darien, Conn., where he was sent by a kind Sunshiner, she could walked with ease upon legs that were perfectly straight. Any Sunshiner desiring to send a child to either of the Sunshine Lodges, for both are open all winter, can do so on writing for information to Miss Ella I. Keen, President of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunshine Branch.

Stray Sunshine

Mr. Trefi Schenck of Griswold, Mass., is an invalid in a wheel chair. His greatest wish for years has been to own a guitar, but just as soon as the money has been almost saved, their some serious illness or some greater need for the money has arisen and his hopes have been frustrated. One lady offered to exchange a large guitar with him if he had a small one. Perhaps some Sunshiner may have one which is not in use, and it would mean happiness to this young man.

Charlie Hawkins of Stuart, Virginia, was born without arms. One leg is four inches shorter than the other. He would be so grateful for pretty a Junior Sunshine branch in St. Louis, Mo., would like a letter party on September 27. Miss Dickinson is a great sufferer, yet devotes a great deal of time to making others happy.

Mothers who have healthy, well-formed children can realize what the Sunshine Lodges and Nurseries are doing for little ones. Mothers who are struggling to keep their families together often resort to ways of caring for their little ones in their absence that may not exactly carry the approval of their consciences. One woman in Brooklyn, who was compelled to go out to work every day to support her little one, fearing that he might meet with some accident if allowed to run around, tied him in his crib, with food for the day within his reach. This course was pursued until, at three years of age, the child was discovered to have no use of his legs. He had never been allowed to use them. After a few weeks of the freedom found at picture books or toys. Some one who is a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Branch may send him a book containing pictures or some little gift.

Since childhood Cornelius Fassio has suffered a form of spinal paralysis. He is now twenty-three years old. We quote here excerpts from his letter: "I cannot walk or even stand; and the pains are becoming more than I can bear, causing me to toss from side to side, night after night. Yet I feel so full of ambition, it ought to be used for some good purpose. I always try to suffer without complaint, knowing full well that some day I will enjoy that peace which is possible to all who love God; and he may yet make me able to walk. My life has been full of strange vicissitudes, but I am and pray for success—to be able to start a business here in copying, and to get sufficient treatment and care to drive away the pain.

To earn his living he procured a typewriter. Friends and others have given him copying to do at times. Cornelius, though deformed and a great sufferer, is a bright, studious boy who is bravely struggling upwards in the face of bitter adversity. He deserves to be helped. Will not the reader send him an encouraging letter, if nothing more?

CHRISTIANITY IN JAPAN*

A Unique Mission Field, Presenting Unusual Attractions, But Full of Difficulty

NONE of the mission fields presents exactly the same characteristics as Japan. It is unique in its conditions and its difficulties. The latter are chiefly due to the phenomenal, social and political development of the country during the past half century. In 1859, when the first systematic attempt was made by Protestant societies to give the Gospel to Japan, a tidal wave of foreign influence was rising which, nine years later, was to change the whole attitude of this wonderful people. The long epochs through which European nations plodded and stumbled along toward civilization, were compressed in Japan into a decade. The remarkable intelligence and quickness of appreciation accepted Western ideas like a revelation, and with a celerity new in the history of nations, the national character was changed. It seemed, thirty years ago, as if Japan would immediately become Christian; that it would accept Christianity as part of the civilization it so much admired. But a reaction came, and now the danger is that the Japanese, having largely rejected their ancient religion, should reject all religion and become materialists and infidels.

This situation makes Japan a unique field. The missionary has to deal with a highly educated and intelligent people, thoroughly familiar with the controversies of Christendom. It is necessary, therefore, that he should be a man thoroughly rooted and grounded in the faith, believing intensely in Christian principles, and capable of giving a reason for the hope that is in him. In their eagerness to obtain results, the Japanese are liable to overlook the necessity of sound principle, and of the righteousness which alone exalts a nation. The building of education has been so rapid, that there is reason to fear that the foundation was not well laid. Like the stony ground hearers in the parable, there is not sufficient depth of earth. Men are needed to go through the length and breadth of the country to convince the forty-three millions of its people that in Christianity alone is there real hope of permanent progress. There is ground for hope. Men occupying high official station have become Christians; many teachers in the colleges and schools are Christians, and both these facts give direct encouragement to further effort. But the necessity for arduous and persistent work is clear.

Summer Work in Tent "Evangel"

THE work in gospel tent "Evangel," Fifty-sixth street and Broadway, New York, is proving to be very successful. The preaching is of a high order, and the Holy Spirit is present in power in the work. The Superintendent (Rev. G. W. McPherson) has become an enthusiast over the new feature of the movement, viz.: the open-air preaching. Services are held at two stations nightly, one in front of a near-by theatre, the other at Fifty-sixth street and Eighth avenue, and large crowds hear the Word in these services, and hands are frequently uplifted for prayer.

Next season it is planned to belt the lower end of Central Park with open-air meetings. During the closing week in September a large number of open-air services will be held under the direction of tent "Evangel." There will be twelve stations in all, where pastors and evangelists will preach nightly.

Conductors of this movement believe it is high time that the churches stopped complaining of spiritual death, and wake to the necessity and call of the hour to go out into the by-ways and hedges. Laymen must be awakened and trained.

We can convert the multitudes if we wake up. If Jesus Christ were in New New York to-day he would call upon the pastors and their people to shorten their vacations, and lend him a helping hand on the great thoroughfares, and around the parks, and help save the masses from going to hell across-lots. When it is recalled that during one week 3,500 people attended the services in the tent, and that thousands heard the Gospel in open-air services during the same time,—in all 7,000 souls in seven days were instructed, a larger number than is gathered in any seven New York Churches any summer week,—is it not high time that Gospel tent work in New York should be pushed with energy and zeal? The work is suffering for proper financial support. Alas, that this grand union Gospel movement, the only large effort made in all the central part of this great city to lift the sinning, should be short $1,500 toward meeting all expenses. If any readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would send gifts to that good paper to aid in the above cause, they would be greatly appreciated.

G. W. McPHERSON.

While the summer Gospel tent work in certain large cities, other than New York, has been loyally sustained by the united Christian churches, and aided in meeting all necessary expenses, the work in Tent "Evangel," New York, has been wholly dependent upon voluntary contributions. It is a work deserving of generous support. Any contributions for that purpose sent to this journal will be forwarded to the conductors of the work.

A BIBLE CAMPAIGN for 1903-4

By Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D.
Corresponding Secretary of the Evangelistic Committee

IN carrying out the resolution of the last General Assembly for "the holding of Conferences for quickening the spiritual life of the Church, and for the study of the Word of God which may encourage the spirit of evangelism," on the part of both pastors and members, the Evangelistic Committee has arranged with the well-known Bible teacher and expositor, Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., of Boston, author of The Synthetic Study of the Bible, to give his whole time this coming fall and winter to that work under its auspices, beginning October 1. Dr. Gray has so wide a constituency throughout our own country and across the water that little need be said of him. The pastor of one church for fifteen or sixteen years, until led out into his unique work of expounding and teaching the English Bible, he now devotes his entire energy to that special line of service. Commencing in theological seminaries and Bible Institutes, where he has been used in blessing hundreds of students now preaching and teaching the Word in the uttermost parts of the earth, his spiritual and yet popular method and style began to attract the people, in the larger masses, until, under God, the work has become the inspiration of interdenominational Bible Classes phenomenal in the history of the Church as to size, enthusiasm and results. Many of these classes have had a membership of one thousand or more, and some have even reached two or three times that size. They have been held weekly, in different cities, throughout a whole winter, and in some cases for successive winters, or throughout the whole year, summer and winter included.

The plan of the Committee, as far as it is yet defined, is to place Dr. Gray in communities where the conditions favor, for a longer or shorter period, giving him an opportunity not only to reach the people with the Word, but to touch the inner life of the ministry in retreats or quiet conferences arranged for that purpose, with the hope of increasing their spiritual fruitfulness in various directions Dr. Gray may be addressed at Winona Lake, Indiana, until October 1, and after that at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Incidents at the Silver Bay Conference

AMONG the many interesting incidents that Mr. Silas H. Paine related at the Y. P. C. E. Missionary Conference, held at Silver Bay this summer, was the following:

In June, 1609, a fleet of canoes pushed out from the shore manned by savages. In the foremost boat were three white men. One was a missionary of the Cross from France, to tell the old old story. One was a French merchant, and the other was a sailor and soldier named Champlain, who had been sent out by the King of France to explore and to establish a new France, which was the distinguished spot of Ticonderoga. He looked at the missionary by his side, and at the savages who plied the oars, and uttered one sentence: "It is of greater importance to save a soul than to found an empire."

MRS. BESSERER, Mr. S. H. Hadley's assistant in mission work, told of a dying girl who led twelve souls to Jesus in one week.

A LITTLE tract, in the hall of the Educational Exhibit, contains a young girl's prayer. It is this:

"Dear Lord, Jesus died on the Cross to save us all, and yet there are people in heathen lands who know nothing of thee. They are dying every day, and do not know the way to get to thy beautiful heaven. Help us to send them the true way. Every one can help. So make us willing to help for Jesus' sake."

THIS prayer was offered in a missionary meeting, and a little errand boy heard it, and the words "They do not know the way to thy beautiful heaven," and "Every one can help" kept ringing in his ears, and he, too, prayed that they might be taught how to get there.

One day little Alec was taken sick and sent to the hospital, and he told the doctor who attended him the little story of Helen Morris' prayer, and the words rang in the doctor's ears until he decided to stand up for Jesus as missionary in a foreign land, and his name stands foremost in the ranks of noble workers for Jesus.

MR. JOHN WILLIS BAER endeavord to impress upon every young person present the necessity of laborers in our own country, placing great stress upon the need of consecrated, zealous, labor in the far West, especially in Utah. He narrated many pathetic stories, perhaps none more so than the following: A farmer having ridden over the plains, left four of his boys at the schoolhouse, and was told that the school was full; he turned and went away, then went back. "Take three," he said. "No," was the reply. He went away the second time, and returned. "Take two," he said, with tears in his eyes. "No." Away he goes, and returns. "Look here, my little boy, he come home, and he teach me." All of his pleadings did not avail. The result was that the building was enlarged so that many more could be accommodated in the school.

ANOTHER story was about a little child being lost in the wheat fields, and how ninety men went in search of it, and finally came upon the little lifeless form. He urged every one present to join hands and go through God's wheat-fields searching for the lost ones before it is too late.

Syracuse, N. Y. CHARLOTTE E. GRAVES.

A Fine Collection of Premiums

I notice in a recent CHRISTIAN HERALD a lady speaks of having forty-nine books, with many other things. I, too, have many large books, magazines, cabinet of things from the Holy Land, a large piece of olive wood, one HERALD library, four Bibles, one Red-letter Testament, Art Portfolio, Art Gallery. Many of the magazines and books were given away as presents with one extra copy of the paper. I have taken THE HERALD since 1889, and shall continue to take it, if possible, while I live. I am in my eighty-seventh year.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON V.

Time.—Tune and Time, or Pitch and Rhythm, are the two primary elements of music. In the preceding lessons your attention was given to the Study of Tune. You are now to take up the study of Time.

5.—Time in music is reckoned by regular successions of pulsations called Pulses or Beats. The force, stronger or weaker, that pulsations may have is called Accent. The two primary degrees of accent are the strong accent and the weak accent.

Illustration.—Take a string about four feet long, and attach to one end a weight of about a pound or two. This little implement we will call a metronome, time marker. Fasten the string at about half its length to a table or shelf, and set the weight swinging. When it is swinging steadily, say to yourself, or with your fingers on a pencil upon a book or table, or speaking the word "tap," accent the first of each swing. Make the first of every two taps a little stronger than the second. Thus, Tap, tap, tap, tap, etc. Keep this up for half a minute or longer until you get into the swing of it and feel clearly the accent "tap" into "tap," the "tap" having the sound of "ta" in "tap," "tap," "tap," giving it a singing tone instead of speaking, and making it alternately strong and weak, thus, Tap tap, Tap tap, etc.

Do this until it goes easily, and then try it without the help of the metronome, that is, do it mentally, without any outward manifestations. In this practice you observe that the pulses are formed into groups of twos. Next form them into groups of threes, making the first in every three with the strong accent, thus—Taa taa taa, Taa taa taa, etc.

Measures.—In the above practice each swing of the metronome, each tap or each "taa" marks a pulse, and each group of two or three pulses forms a measure.

6.—The groups of pulses formed by strong and weak accents are called Measures. A measure consisting of two pulses, one strong and one weak, is called Two-Pulse measure. A measure consisting of one strong and two weak pulses is called Three-Pulse measure.

There are two ways of marking time in music. One way is to count the pulses of the measures; the other, is to make certain motions of the hand, called beating time. For two-pulse measure, the counts are ONE, two, ONE, two, etc., the motions of the hand are Down, up, Down, up, etc. For three-pulse measure, the counts are ONE, two, three, ONE, two, three, etc., the motions, Down, left, up, Down, left, up, etc. The count One and the motion Down always go with the strong accent. You should now practice counting and beating in two-pulse and three-pulse measures at different rates of movement, with and without the help of the metronome.

Notes.—Notes have two uses: by their position on the staff they indicate which tones are to be sung, and by their shapes the lengths of the tones.

7.—The relative length of tones is represented by notes of different shapes for the different lengths. The notes in common use are:

The names of the notes indicate their relative values. A whole note represents a tone twice as long as that represented by a half note, four times as long as that indicated by a quarter note, and so on.

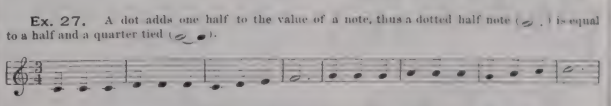
8.—Any note may be taken to represent the time of a pulse. For our present studies, we will use the quarter note for tones one pulse long, and the half note for tones two-pulses long.

9.—Figures, in the form of a fraction, are called the measure-sign. The upper figure, denotes the number of pulses in the measure, the lower figure, the kind of note that goes to a pulse. Thus $\frac{2}{4}$ means two-pulse measure, quarter note to the pulse; $\frac{3}{4}$ means three-pulse measure, quarter note to the pulse. The figure 4 in each case stands for a quarter note.

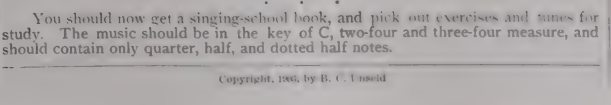
To study the exercises that follow, first "read" the characters as you point to them, thus—"Treble clef; Do on the added line below, and third space; measure-sign two-four, two-pulse measure quarter note to the pulse; first measure, do mi, quarter notes, one-pulse tones; second measure, So la, two-pulse tone," and so on. Next, set the metronome swinging at a slow movement, and sing the exercise to the syllables in time with the swinging; when this goes well repeat it at a faster movement; lastly, sing it to la.

Ex. 25.

Ex. 26. A curved line connecting two notes ( ) is called a Tie, it shows that the tone is to be prolonged through the time of both notes.



Ex. 27. A dot adds one half to the value of a note, thus a dotted half note ( ) is equal to a half and a quarter tied ( ).



Ex. 28. As a test exercise, copy the following, in notes, on both the treble and bass staves, in two-pulse measure. Supply the clefs, the measure-sign and the bars. The figures over the letters indicate the time values to be written in notes. 1 means one pulse, 2 means two pulses.

d	r	m	m	r	d	d	m	s	s	f	m	r	m	f	m	r	d

You should now get a singing-school book, and pick out exercises and tunes for study. The music should be in the key of C, two-four and three-four measure, and should contain only quarter, half, and dotted half notes.

A Ride Across the "Big Smoky" Mountains

these scores of bright mountain boys and girls can enjoy the advantages of other more favored people. I was glad to find the foundation laid, and the frame up, for a building of six rooms, the first school of its kind in all this wild region. They need help to complete it. The poor people, with little else to give, have contributed some lumber, and much labor in digging out a foundation in six feet of rock in the mountain side. I doubt if there is a "higher" school anywhere, and the children will have to climb like squirrels to reach their Alma Mater on that mountain brow. But it was the best and only place to build it, for land is scarce in the Great Smokies, and it all stands on its edge.

The flood continued all night, and if these mountains had not been built of rock, they would have been washed away. An engagement compelled me to leave tains of rock, like the rapids of Niagara. Night brought me to the hill of the Watauga, and to the mission of our faithful evangelists, the Parmelees. I found them in a little log cabin, at the head of a hollow, just wide enough for a horse to get through. They were busy and happy teaching twenty-five bright children of the hills, every day, in their little cabin, and seventy-five people every Wednesday night, and one hundred and fifty every Sunday, in an old, deserted, Dunkard meeting-house, half a mile below.

This is the work our Society of Soul Winners is doing in fifty missions, scattered over the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina, beyond all others. It is for the regeneration of a race of Highlanders, long neglected, and worthy of a better fate. We thank the noble band of "good Samaritans," whose generous sympathy and help have enabled the next morning, and I was sorry I could not stay longer to help those faithful missionaries. They deserve more than they will ever receive this side of heaven, but they are content to "labor and to wait."

Our little Brown boy and "Joe," brought me down to the railroad, and river, another way, not quite so bad as I went up. The flood of rain had converted the river into a raging torrent, rushing down from the North Carolina mountains. It had overwhelmed the track in some places, and undermined it in others, so that it took all hands from 8 A.M., to 12 M., to get back to Newport without getting drowned. In the whole twenty miles, the roaring, rushing river, tore down the narrow defile between the moun-

CALLED HIGHER

Rev. John McGregor passed away July 9, 1903, at his home in Brimley, Mich. He was for a number of years engaged in distributing religious literature in the community, and especially among the camp men. His kindly face and voice will be missed by many in that vicinity.

In the death of Mrs. Evangela E. Hayes, which occurred on Decoration Day, 1903, at Kingston, N. Y., in the eighty-sixth year of her age, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has lost one who has been a continuous subscriber for many years. She was born in Livonia, N. Y., January 5, 1818, a daughter of Rev. Ebenezer Everett, a pioneer missionary in western New York. She gave her heart to Christ in her early years, and ever exemplified his teachings by a life of unselfishness and consecration. Her interest in the various charities of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was unflagging. She will be mourned by a large circle of friends, "Many of whom shall rise up to call her blessed."

Mrs. Laura A. Muzzy, of Ottawa, Kan., who passed away recently, was born in Auburn, N. Y., August 3, 1817, and was consequently in her eighty-sixth year. She joined the Presbyterian Church at the age of seventeen, and was a faithful and devoted member to the close of life. She leaves a beautiful example of true, conscientious, Christian womanhood. Both her maternal and paternal grandsires fought in the Revolutionary War. She was a descendant of the Pease family of England, also of the Chapin family, who were originally from France. She leaves four daughters, three of whom are married; sixteen living grandchildren and ten great grandchildren. She was the last one of a family of eight children, and one of four of them to pass four score years. One brother went as a missionary to Cyprus in the early days, and died on the mission field. For nearly ten years she had been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and when her eyesight grew dim her daughters read it aloud to her. For three years she had been partially an invalid, but was frequently able to be outdoors in her wheel-chair, which was the gift of her children and grandchildren.

OBEDIENCE AND PATIENCE

A MAN WHO TRUSTED GOD AND WAITED FOR HIM

By Mrs. M. Baxter

ONE of the most solemn lessons we have in the whole of the Word of God, on the exactitude of God's requirement of obedience, d how he cannot accept a partial or alified obedience is that of Saul's fail- e. "I did it with the best intentions" ny a one will say who has not wholly llowed the Lord, but if a good inten- n is in disobedience to a distinct com- nd of God, it becomes a sin, and not a rvice. This is, therefore, why the Lord id through Samuel: "Hath the Lord as eat delight in burnt-offerings and sacri- es as in obeying the voice of the Lord? hold, to obey is better than sacrifice, d to hearken, than the fat of rams." O, w much work for God is done in self- ll. Men and women do it in a way to it their own tastes, and will, and con- nience, and not in strict and willing nformity to the declared will of God in s Word. Does God accept it? Is not e failure of power in the churches used by this?

Even before Saul's final rejection, Sam- l had said to Saul: "The Lord hath ught him a man after his own heart, d the Lord hath appointed him to be ince over his people, because thou hast t kept that which the Lord commanded ee" (I. Sam. 13: 14), and now the Lord ds the humiliating word: "The Lord th rent the kingdom of Israel from thee is day, and hath given it to a neighbor thine that is better than thou" (I. Sam. : 28). And shortly after Samuel is sent anoint David. David was not fault- ss, he committed some grievous sins; t the bent of the man's life was to dis- ver the will of God, and to do it. He ver manifests the desire to exalt him- lf, to please himself, or to yield to his n will. Obedience is the great char- teristic of his life, and with it an in- nse appreciation of his God, making his e one of adoration and praise. "I have und David, the son of Jesse, a man ter my heart, who shall do all my will." uch is the witness which God bore to m (Acts 13: 22. R. V).

God's chosen king must rule in the fear God (II. Sam. 23: 3), doing all his will. his is the true characteristic of such as e kings and priests unto God; chosen to ign with Christ. But such must learn to dare, and must learn to suffer. Satan exerts all his rage against those whom God has anointed (II. Cor. 1: 21). Before David's quiet anointing in the presence of his brethren was known in Israel, God brought him in contact with the Philistine champion, and all Israel must recognize through the conquest of the giant by a stripling who trusted in Israel's God, and went forth to meet him unarmed, but in the name of the Lord of Hosts, that they had one among them who counted for more than Saul when things came to extremities. And some of the old men might remember how in the time of the Judges God's deliverances occurred when some man whom God raised up had been little enough in his own eyes to be fully at the disposal of his God, knowing that the battle was the Lord's.

But the very victory over the giant was made the beginning of a strife between man's king and God's king, which ended only with the death of Saul. Saul knowing the will of God regarding David, hated that will, and opposed it with all his might, clinging tenaciously to his position, and manifesting a hatred towards David which showed itself in ten separate attempts upon his life. But God had decreed that David should reign, and man could not reverse it. David's life was safe by the declared will of God, and all Saul's attempts to slay him, or to get others to slay him, were futile. Meanwhile Jonathan, the Crown Prince, became the warm friend and chosen companion of David, whom he loved, honored and recognized as God's choice, and unlike his father's jealousy, this man of God rejoiced that David should be preferred before him. This maddened Saul all the more. The flesh (for Saul is a type of the flesh) cannot endure that Christ should have any glory except through its own patronage.

But at last David was put to a test which brought out the spirit which animated him. On two separate occasions, as it might seem by accident, but really by the ordering of God, Saul's life was in his power, and in one moment he could have slain him. But David looked at all things and persons in their relation to God. He never complained to men of Saul's unjust persecution.

A New Work Never Before Printed

Everything Absolutely New

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is not an old work brought down to date by the patching up of old plates, but is an absolutely new production, just completed from new plates made from new type, and never before printed from. It contains the very latest information on every subject that can engage the human mind. Undertaken for the express purpose of providing the best Encyclopedia ever published, the Editor and his three hundred specialists have spared neither pains nor expense to carry out the trust with which they were commissioned.

The Best Work of its Kind

Each one of the 75,000 subjects handled have been carefully and scientifically considered, and treated as though the reputation of the entire work depended on that particular article. Hence we have a work more thorough, more comprehensive, more intelligible, even to the untutored mind, than dozens of more pretentious and infinitely more expensive productions.

Just Published A. D. 1903

As a Universal Educator, THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is absolutely unsurpassed. It is a great compendium of all human knowledge, whether pertaining to History, Science, Art, Invention, Geography, Biography, Literature, Commerce, Manufacture, or any other subject. It takes in the whole range, and affords, in the most accessible shape, all the light available to the most careful research, and highest expert authority.

It is very important that the reader bear in mind that this is a New Work, and hence, though an Encyclopedia may already enrich his library, this latest production is nevertheless necessary, in order that he may be posted up to date. An old encyclopedia, set ten or twenty years ago, with a few statistics doctored up to make them current—though bound in genuine Turkey Morocco, or Russia—is still an old work of reference, and affords no later information on science, invention, wars, or the recent events of importance than was contained in the manuscript when first written, twenty or more years ago.

Twentieth Century Information

The Scholar, the Student, the Professional Man, the Banker, the Merchant, the Mechanic, the Laborer, the Housekeeper, the Mother, the Wife, require up-to-date information. The ideas of the last decade will not apply to-day. Things have changed, progress has been made, and an Encyclopedia of the Nineteenth Century is as antiquated in the Twentieth Century as the summer's fashions of 1880 differ from those of 1903.

Contains Most Recent Subjects

Just think of getting your information about Cuba, Philippines, Electricity, Motors, Automobiles, Klondike, South Africa, The Hague Tribunal, and other modern subjects, from a work compiled in 1880, or even before. Surely a few statistical alterations concerning Population, Exports, Imports, etc., will throw no additional light o current matters which interest the great human famil far more than mere recent additions to Population, o immaterial changes in the extent of our Commerce. TH TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCY CLOPEDIA is a work of To-day, and handles ever subject from the view-point of 1903, and, indeed, man things look quite differently to us now than they di twenty years or more ago.

No Patched-Up Plates

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA throws a new light on the affairs o the world. It has a new view-point. The world ha made wonderful progress in every direction. It does no stand still in the matters of Invention, Commerce, Ar Literature, Manufactures and Science, while statistic change, but its progress is in all directions, and som things that are perfection to-day were not even though of ten years ago. Hence Encyclopedic knowledge i ever changing and ever advancing. We live in a busy bustling, active age, and a year of the present is equal t a decade a quarter of a century ago. Surely the ol Encyclopedias, with doctored statistics, do not and can not satisfy the demand for up-to-date information.

Twelve Mammoth Volumes

The publishers of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA realized this fact and therefore they had a new work prepared, newly written, newly set, and newly printed. And it is this great work, the result of the most modern research, tha we here offer in twelve mammoth volumes of over 700 pages each, with maps of every country and state beautifully printed, and with many superb half-tone ful page inserts, illustrating the progress of the world in al its various and exceedingly interesting phases, all attrac tively and substantially bound in high grade cloth and genuine gold.

HIGH CASTE BURMESE | A JAPANESE DUCHESS | THE HISTORIC "WOMEN OF CARTHAGE" | LOWER CLASS CHINESE | KOREAN AND DAUGHTER

WOMAN IN OTHER LANDS THAN OURS

By JESSIE ACKERMAN

THE subject of woman is full of interest. She is a study, from both an ancient and modern standpoint; and also from an Occidental and Oriental comparison. The mother-love instinct forms the basic point of operation for the betterment of all classes of women, even among those of most limited intelligence; and this is as true of the women of Oriental lands as of our own. The position of women in heathen lands cannot be fully understood, unless studied in the setting of the country to which they belong. The special suppressed privileges under which they live, is not so much due to man's natural lack of regard for her, as his desire to carry out the ideas of the founders of the religious faiths which prevail in those lands.

The most withering, blighting and degrading force that ever fell upon woman, in any age, was the teaching of Confucius. The arraignment in Eden left the possibility of woman rising through the promise, but the Chinese sage gave forth his "Three Obediences," he relegated woman to a place of servitude, from which she can never rise, so long as his teachings find place in the superstitions of men.

It is almost impossible to give any adequate idea of the women of China. Their great multitudes are positively overpowering. In leaving the ports and traveling inland, I adopted the dress of the country, this was done as a matter of comfort, and also to attract less attention to myself. In entering a village of some 60,000 souls, where a white woman had not been seen, the news of the presence of a "foreign devil," soon spread over the town. The gathering throng pressed upon me from all directions, until I was unable to move, except as I was borne on by the curious crowd. Reaching a rice field, and stepping upon a stone, there was a sea of faces as far as the eye could reach. Through my interpreter I tried to speak to the people. Women elbowed to where I stood, and looking into my face with great earnestness, chatted away in the unknown tongue, asking more questions in a minute than any sane woman could ever answer. I learned that they were not in the least anxious to learn what I was talking about, but they were curious about me. The kind of questions reflected, of course, the matters of their greatest concern. The very life of my interpreter seemed endangered in their frantic efforts to ask questions. "How old is she?" roared one woman from the distance, who was unable to reach him. "Can't she speak our words?" or "Has she a husband?" were the perplexing questions to be answered. Upon receiving information upon the last, they immediately exclaimed, "how sad!"

I soon understood that it was a waste of strength and energy to attempt to talk to the crowd, and try to learn anything of their condition or needs, in that manner. I simply took a few of them—six or eight—and going into one of their homes, shut the door. That is the way the women of China must have the Gospel. Only one woman in a thousand knows how to read: they must hear the Gospel Story, if they are ever to know it. At present there is one Missionary to about every half million.

THE QUEEN OF SIAM AND HER DAUGHTERS

A HIGH-CLASS CHINESE

The customs of the empire as affecting women are somewhat understood, but the real position of the women of China can only be appreciated by contact with them. The life of the low-class woman is full of sorrow, hardship and burden. It is a common thing in the interior to see a woman and a buffalo ploughing together on the rice fields. In the stone quarries, they wield a great hammer from sunrise until night, pounding stones for the highways and carrying burdens beneath which a beast would sink. This, of course, applies to the women of the lower class, but they very largely make up the population of the entire empire.

Before the introduction of Confuscianism into Japan, women shared public duties with men. When one of the Emperors was warned of the gods to go forth and conquer Korea, not knowing the land, much less the people, "he declined the honor." The Empress raised an army, fitted out a fleet, and leaving her faint-hearted lord behind, led her forces to battle. Three years later she returned from a field of victory, her ships freighted with a human cargo—prisoners of war—a sufficient number to furnish the country with slaves.

The three masterpieces in Japanese literature were written by women, and among the twelve sovereigns who sat upon the throne in one century, five were women who ruled with varying degrees of success. One of these women used the influence of her high position to further the propagation of the Buddhistic faith, and lavished the wealth of the country upon her efforts. She ordered millions of paintings of Buddha's face made and scattered over the land. Then founding a religious order for women, she became a nun, introducing a monkish costume, and performing the offices of the temple with as much zeal and authority as a priest.

At the present time there is a great army of nuns. I met one—an old woman over seventy—in Korea, who had gone to perform some religious ceremony over the neglected graves of Japanese soldiers. As a rule, they do not officiate, but must submit to 348 commandments, shave their heads and "refrain from the use of scented water or perfumed bags"—great sacrifices for a Japanese woman. These are the results of the "Obedience" brought over from China by missionaries of the Confucian faith. A woman must first obey her father absolutely, even to the extent of marrying the man he selects for her. Then, as a wife, her obedience is subjected to the marching orders of an oft-times tyrannical mother-in-law, and in old age there comes the increased subjection to the whims of a son, whose filial love is great, but whose authority is inexorable and undisputed.

In Siam, the women have progressed less, according to the enlightenment of the ruler, than those of any other country of the world. Every woman is branded on the wrist to indicate to which branch of imperial family she belongs. They have no civil rights; in fact, no legal existence. A woman could not own a paper of pins in her own name. If her husband or father be-

The Divine Teacher

TEXT—MATTHEW 11: 29:
"Believe in me"

THE school-house is the great reservoir in which are collected the streams of knowledge which have flowed down from the ages. It is the place where scholars can climb upon the broad shoulders of the intellectual giants of the past and the present, and see as far as they have seen, because those shoulders are lifting those students' heads toward the stars. It is the place in which man is taught how to harness the winds, and lasso the electricity, and tap the oil wells, and contribute to the common wealth and development of his brother man, so that all working together may cause the "desert to blossom as the rose." "What is the cause of all those fine farms, big barns, and immense granaries? Why this thrift and prosperity everywhere?" I once asked a Pennsylvania farmer, when bicycling through Lancaster county. "The school-house," he replied. "You cannot go anywhere in this part of our State without finding the public school-house at almost every cross roads, and the small college in almost every town of any size." "What is the cause of your dilapitated farms, and the slothfulness and filth I see everywhere around me?" I asked another farmer that same spring, in a region a few hundred miles from the one the prosperity of which prompted my first question. "To the absence of the school-house," was the answer. "Most of our people are ignorant and uneducated. What is more, most of our people do not want to learn, neither do they wish their children to learn." Against such a wall of opposition as that, it is almost impossible for intellectual progress to make any true headway.

Eminent Teachers

We would eulogize that compound word of eleven letters, called the "school-house." But, after all, the "school-house" is merely a representative term. Its true value is not in the intrinsic worth of the bricks, and stones, and wood which compose its buildings; it is in the spiritual and intellectual worth of the men and the women who stand behind its teachers' desks. Students from far and near came to sit at the feet of Hillel, and his famous grandson Gamaliel, although for the most part those teachers had no buildings of any worth. Plato was the disciple of Socrates, and the teacher of Aristotle, who was the founder of the Academic School, famous the world round; yet, for the most part these men had the street corners for their class-rooms, and the hillsides for their laboratories. They were poor in pocket, though rich in brains. The name of Thomas Arnold has given Rugby its greatest fame. The name of Eliphalet Nott, is the most priceless heritage Union College at Schenectady ever received. The name of Mark Hopkins is of more value to Williams' College, than an endowment of $5,000,000 could ever be. With my own eyes, as a student, I saw that great educator, then eighty-four years of age, leaving our college town to attend the Harvard Centennial. Seated upon the rostrum at Harvard, on that great occasion, were the President of the United States, and Senators and Governors, and leaders in the various walks of life. But when Mark Hopkins—old Williams' pride—slowly ascended the platform, the whole audience rose en masse and bowed. That homage was a tribute to the fact that the skilled workman is greater than his factory—that the teacher is of more importance than the school-house in which he stands.

The Divine Teacher is our theme. If we have not yet learned the value of Jesus Christ as an instructor, then let us learn it now in the command of my text. Jesus, in these three words recorded in Matthew, emphasizes the great fact that from him, and him alone, we can learn the Gospel lessons we ought to learn. Thus, to-day, I would grasp the ropes of the village school-house, and the city church bells as the college sexton holds his bell-rope; and, as I pull, and the church bells swing backward and forward, and the silver notes of these bells go echoing down the valleys until they plunge up against the sounding-boards of the hills, I would cry as a Gospel minister: "Come to school! Come to school! All ye, who would learn of Jesus, come to school! Come to school!" Is not this the meaning of my text: "Learn of me?"

The Authoritative Voice

The Gospel class-room, in the first place, has in Christ an authoritative teacher. I invite you, with confidence, to sit at his feet, because he has a right to teach. He speaks, not only because as a human being He has learned what we ought to learn; but He comes, clothed with divine authority. His credentials are higher than those of any human teacher; they proceed from God himself. He is the Son and the co-equal of God the Father. He comes to us as a conqueror, clothed in white vesture, "and on his thigh a name written, King of kings and Lord of lords." "For He taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes."

In this age of intellectual progress, it is absolutely essential for every true teacher, whether of the higher or the lower grades, to have his or her credentials. For instance: If I wish to educate one of my little girls to be a public school-teacher, I say to her, "Now, daughter, your future life occupation depends entirely upon yourself and your work. I am going to send you through the common public school. I believe every child should go there, be she rich or poor, black or white, Jew or Gentile, or Catholic. In order to produce the best types of American citizenship, all classes of children should stand shoulder to shoulder, and hand in hand at the school desk. Then I will send you to the high school, then to the normal. Then, when you have your different diplomas, you can go before the State Board, or County Board of Examiners, and have your knowledge tested. Then if you pass, your teacher's certificates will be given you. But, daughter, you cannot teach in any public school unless you are an authoritative teacher—unless you have your credentials. Without them you cannot even be a cadet, or a substitute for a day." All the 5,775 teachers of Chicago who faced the 268,392 scholars of Cook County last year, were prepared for an instructor's life in this way.

Christ's Credentials

I ask the Professor of Geology in some great university what right he has to occupy a teacher's chair. "I have been appointed," he answers, "by the heads of the university with the approval of the faculty. I have demonstrated my fitness to teach by the text-books I have written. I have studied the strata of the rocks. I have sat at the feet of the greatest masters of the science; I hold diplomas from domestic and foreign universities. These are my credentials." So Christ enters the Gospel class-room as a teacher, clothed with authority. The wisdom of the God-head was given to him; in the counsels of eternity he learned the mysteries of the Divine government; he became man, and by a career that is the wonder of the ages, he has taught his people how to live. These are his credentials.

Now, my friends, as Gospel students, are you ready to accept Jesus Christ as an authoritative teacher? Are you ready to accept him as the Son of God? A few weeks ago, a gentleman wrote to a friend of mine, a pathetic letter which went something like this: "Oh, why do the ministers keep on preaching upon useless and impractical subjects? Why do they not preach upon some of the vital questions of the soul? A short time ago the doctors told me that within six months I must die. What I want to know is how I can straighten out a wasted life so as to meet my God?" Well, my brother, if these words should ever be seen by your eye or repeated to your ear, the first step for you to take is to accept Jesus as the Divine Teacher. You are not to accept him as did Joseph Ernest Renan, "as a good man." You must not accept him as do many, as a religious leader like Mohammed, or Buddha, or Zoroaster, or Confucius. You are not to accept him as a seer, or prophet, a John the Baptist, an Elias, or a Jeremiah? You are to accept him as did Simon Peter, when he turned and said, "Thou art Christ, the Son of the Living God." Are you ready to accept the authoritative Jesus as Divine?

The Miraculous Endorsement

Oh, the credentials of the teacher, Christ! In the prophecies of Scripture, we can read them. In the miracles which he performed we can verify them. In the testimony of John the Baptist, and in the Heavenly Father's voice, which sounded over the dripping locks of the Son of God when Christ was baptized, we can prove them. Christ's credentials are of the highest authority. They must be accepted. Napoleon was one day riding along the lines of the French Army, when his horse shied. Instantly a common soldier leaped forth from the ranks and saved his commander from being thrown. Napoleon smiled at his rescuer, and said, "Thank you, captain." Quick as a flash, the soldier saluted and asked his chief, "Of what regiment, sire?" The delighted Emperor replied, "Of my own Guards." He then rode on. With that, the soldier threw away his gun and stepped over to where the staff officers of the Guards were collected. Indignantly, those officers ordered him back to the ranks. With that, the new-made captain raised his head as he answered, "I am no longer a private soldier; I am a captain of the Emperor's Guards." "By what authority do you make such a statement," asked the colonel. Then the soldier pointed towards the retreating form of his ruler, as he answered, "Napoleon said it!" Ah, after that there was no further criticism. Napoleon was the authority. Napoleon was to give him his credentials. So Christ, as the authoritative teacher, comes to us with his credentials. The Father, the Heavenly Father, hath spoken it. Witness the Jordanic revelation: "Behold a light cloud overshadowed them, and behold, a voice out of the cloud which said, "This is my Son in whom I am well pleased. Hear ye him." Authoritatively! Christ always speaks authoritatively.

Self-Sacrificing Service

The Gospel class-room, in the next place, has a self-sacrificing teacher. The word "self-sacrificing" can well be applied to all true men and women who follow the noble profession of teaching. I care not whether those men and women are filling conspicuous professional chairs, as did William Graham Sumner, and John Russell Bartlett, and Julius H. Seeley, and Joseph Storey, and Theodore W. Dwight, and Mrs. Mary Somerville, and Elizabeth Stewart Phelps, and Alice Freeman Palmer, and Mary Lyon, or whether they are teaching in humble district schools; they are all people who sacrifice themselves for the good of others. There is no business or profession on earth in which there is more wear and tear upon the nervous system than upon those conscientious men and women who, week in and week out, spend their lives expounding and explaining and catechising behind a teacher's desk.

Just think of the fractious human colts the average public school-teacher has to train. A great many parents send their children to school in order to get rid of them, as well as to have their brains developed. They cannot stand the boy's racket at home, so they expect the public teacher to supply the neglected maternal discipline. God pity the young graduate of the normal school, who herself is hardly old enough to be a mother, and yet has to keep in line every day thirty or forty boys and girls, most of whom have not yet learned what the word "obedience" means!

Then, estimate the thickness of the skull which every year the teacher has to pry open to let in the intellectual light. It must be a great pleasure for the teacher, who is a genius, to develop a genius. For a Lord Chatham to have for his disciple a William Pitt. For a Franz Liszt to guide the fingers of an Anton Rubinstein over the ivory keys. For an Ignatius Loyola to mould a Francis Xavier. For a Peter Paul Rubens to have for his pupil an Anthony Vandyke. One day, after having examined some of his famous student's work, the great Flemish master delightedly turned to his class and said, "A greater than Rubens is here! The young man whose brush has done this will some day outmaster his master." But though it may be a great pleasure for a genius to develop a genius, yet ninety-nine hundreds of all scholars in all public school class-rooms are not geniuses. They are not only children of ordinary intelligence, but boys and girls, many of them below the ordinary. All of those scholars must be developed. This accounts for the teacher's exhaustion. Then the strain. Then often complete nervous collapse.

The Patient Teacher

But oh, my brother, what is the sacrifice of an earthly teacher for her pupils, compared to that which the Divine Teacher has made for us? Is there any patience like unto his patience? Any forgiveness greater than his forgiveness? Any martyrdom like unto his martyrdom? During the life of the late Thomas Gallaudet—that noble Christlike teacher, sent by God to serve the American deaf-mutes—he often spent days and weeks and months over one pupil, teaching him how to pronounce a single vowel sound. But great as Dr. Gallaudet's sacrifices were, can his patience be compared to my Lord's? As a Divine Teacher, has not Christ spent years and years and years trying to teach us how to speak just two words in the right way—"Our Father?" We read how the missionary teachers have been martyred in China in the defense of their pupils. But was there ever a death of a teacher like unto that of the martyrdom of my Christ? In order to teach us how to attain eternal life, has he not sacrificed for us in his wounded hands and wounded feet and wounded head and gaping side, into which the Roman soldier thrust his spear? Yes! My Lord and my God is a self-sacrificing teacher. He gave his life for his Gospel students. He died that we might live.

But the Divine Teacher Christ has a far greater purpose than to merely save his Gospel students. He teaches his disciples, who sit at his feet in order that they may become like him, how they in turn may carry his message and truth to the farthermost parts of the earth. He looks upon his students with respect to their future, as every true instructor ought to do. I once mes involved in debt, unable to meet the obligation, "binds" his wife out to engage in any form of labor, til the amount of the demand is met—a sort of human wn business.

In a private audience, the King of Siam expressed me remarkable ideas concerning women, showing early that modern movements in the interests of the x has been a matter of observation, if not deep study. e is a much-married man, having forty wives and me 1,500 women in his harem. Each of the latter is a servant or slave, making a total of over 3,000 omen about the palace grounds. Being interrogated to the need of edu- ting his women, the ng's answer was very ever.

"It would never do," id the bright little an, with a twinkle in s eye that discounted e force of his words. If our Siamese wom- were educated, they ould soon become as iscontented as the omen of your coun- y."

Well does this king nderstand that the ly way women can e kept in a harem to keep them in norance. Educate em and give them e Gospel, and walls ould never be built shut them out.

In Burma, women are much freer in all respects than e women of other parts of the Orient. The men are zy beyond expression, and a Burman delights in othing more than in the business capacity of the oman or women he owns and possesses. They go bout without restriction and excel in business, which ften includes wholesale operations extending over the ntire empire.

The first real event in a Burmese girl's life is the ear- oring ceremony, which takes place when she has natured. She is a careless, free child of nature until is process, after which she gives greater attention to ressing and adorning her hair, painting her face and cultivating the swaying carriage, so much admired by the men. A "lucky day" is set by an astrologer, a feast prepared, and a professional borer appears upon the scene. Nothing ever produced a more creepy sensation than seeing this heartless professor of the cruel art draw forth his golden needle, awaiting the signal of the astrologer. The girl was held down to the floor while a band of music played in the court to drown her cries, and the work of boring proceeded. I fled from the room at this point, and upon returning, found the dear child quite restored. Sometimes opium is administered to deaden the pain, but usually the girl leaves out the suffering without an opiate. The pierced spot is not merely a small hole, but from time to time different sized objects are placed in the rent to increase the size. I have seen a woman wearing gold cylinders as large in circumference as a napkin ring.

The lower-class women feel greatly complimented by being engaged in the service of distinguished persons in any capacity. This was strangely illustrated during the lifetime of King Theebau's father. Visiting the buildings once occupied as the royal stables with a guide, who was a Christian, and whom I found reliable in all matters, the guide told me of the sad death of the last of the sacred elephants. The creature was known as the "Lord White Elephant," and to Mandalay flocked multitudes of women to do honor to this divine. When the elephant was captured by the hunters it was found to be very young and unskilled, and unable to escape, as the elephant had not yet learned how to take food. It was learned that the friend assumed had the baby elephant fed with human milk supplied by his slaves twice a day.

In Korea, women have little or no desire to remove themselves from the surroundings of all accustomed who have gone before them. Slaves to the tobacco habit, they smoke and dream when not occupied with heavy toil. A girl comes into the world and is regarded of so little value that, until she is given a name by marriage she is a mere "It." She then becomes known by the district from whence her husband hails. Later, if a boy appears upon the scene the mother is elevated, by becoming known as [illegible] and so. A small bit of compensation may be found in the fact that, after all, the Korean men really fear women. This is due to their belief that a woman has "more to do" therewith the gods than a man possesses.

This leads to a becoming meekness on the part of the man, and he falls back to his pipe and his day-dreams.

It is gathered from these conditions surrounding more than half of the women of the world, that there are countries where there is a real "woman question," where wrongs cry out daily to be righted, where the treadmill of superstition and prejudice would ground women to powder, were she not kept together by the spark of mother-love. Education and the Gospel are the one hope of the women of the Orient, and, indeed, of the women of every land, where those sisters of ours have suffered so long from the abuses of ignorance and dark superstition.

ead of a famous teacher who never entered his class- oom but he always took off his hat and bowed before is scholars as though he was coming into the presence f a king, "for," he said, "no one knows what future uler or leader of the people may be developing under y touch. Therefore, I wish to show my students roper respect." Christ in the same way is looking at is Gospel students, through the eyes of prophecy. He s the Divine Instructor, who teaches his disciples that hrough them we may learn the way of life. He is teach- ng his disciples in order that the countless multitudes, roping about in the darkness of heathendom, may hrough us be brought into saving touch with the Cross.

To duplicate the teacher's knowledge and life in the ives of his students is always the far-reaching purpose f true teaching. Why did General Samuel Chapman rmstrong found the Hampton School near Old Point omfort, and why was that other Indian school estab- ished in Carlisle, Pa.? It was in order to take the In- lian boys and girls from the far West to the East, there o bring them into touch with the white man's teachers, nd the white man's ways, and then to send those In- lian boys back to their tribes, in the hope that the civil- zed red man would in turn civilize his brothers and isters. Why does Booker T. Washington's work have he hearty support of the white men, both of the North nd the South? Because he is trying to duplicate his lain, common-sense, practical life in the lives of his tudents. He is not trying to teach the doctrine that he white and the black races should intermarry. He s the apostle preaching that life means work; that the lack race will never lift itself by political agitations, ut only by its members being good waiters and coach- nen, and honest laborers and provident farmers, and ntelligent wives and mothers. He is preaching "the gospel of the tooth-brush." He does not believe a man, colored or white, can be respectable and be chronically lirty. Such is the duplicating purpose of Alabama's oremost negro educator. Now, my friends, Jesus Christ as a Divine Teacher should have a duplicating ower in the lives of his students. It should be found n the lives of his professing disciples; in the lives of ome of us who have been crowding the Gospel class- oom for the last ten, twenty, yes, even thirty and forty ears. Christ's duplicating power should be found in s, because through us the Gospel must be sent to some inful and some lost soul, to whom otherwise it may never be sent at all.

We have often read how heroic deeds in martial life have saved an army for an earthly king. Can we not realize how our deeds, as the representatives of Christ, can draw men to or drive them away from the Cross? Many years ago, a French Army was battling under the hot and blasting Algerian sun. The forced marches and the counter marches which that army was compelled to take, were enough to kill an African negro, let alone a European. Then, in order to increase the horror, fatal cholera broke out in one regiment. Man after man died. The army became panic-stricken, and all seemed to be lost. But one night, Colonel Gardarens wanted to prove that this dreaded disease was contagious "wholly through food and drink, and in no other way." So he himself lifted one of the cholera corpses out of its bed. Then he turned to his men and said: "Now I will show you that cholera is not infectious. I will pass the night in this man's bed." He raised the bed-clothes, and lay down and slept. In the morning he awoke, arose and departed to his own quarters a well man. That power of a personal example inspired his men. They took heart. The French army was saved. My friends, our examples as representatives of Jesus Christ, must exert the same kind of a good or bad influence that Colonel Gardarens had over his men. As Gospel students, we must duplicate Christ's life or we must misrepresent him. We shall lead sinful men and women to his altar or drive them farther away. "We are the light of the world." "We are the salt of the earth." "We are the cities set upon a hill which cannot be hid." As Gospel students, we are Christ's representatives, Christ's witnesses, and we cannot help it.

But where, as Christian disciples, shall we build Christ's future class-rooms? Everywhere. In them must be gathered the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the white and the black, the Jew, the Gentile. For them the application for membership do not need the endorsement of a wealthy man's check; they are not restricted to a social caste, as is the famous private school near St. Petersburg, which was established only for the sons and daughters of the men who are the favorites of the Russian Czar. Did I say the future Gospel class-rooms must be built for all people alike? I misquoted myself. They must be especially built for the poor and the helpless, and the weak and the lame and the blind, and the outcasts, social and spiritual. The demand is given unto us in emphatic terms, "Go ye out into the highways and the hedges and compel them to come in." these are the words Christ uses. "Compel! Compel! Compel them to come in."

What a message it is that the students in Christ's school are commissioned to deliver to the world! It transforms the whole aspect of life. This world, in the light of our Lord's teaching, is no longer the scene of meaningless suffering, of useless struggle and inevitable disappointment; it is a scene of preparation, of discipline, of education, in the highest sense of the word, for a larger, fuller life. As the children who are now assembling in our school houses are being prepared for a manhood and womanhood of useful service, so the men and women in Christ's school have reached a higher grade. They, too, are being educated and trained for a grander career. The lessons are hard to learn, the discipline is often painful; but we go to our tasks with a brave heart when we discover that there is a purpose in it all. We can bear hardship and persecution and affliction when we know that they are developing in us qualities which we shall need in a better world than this. Thus trials come to us with new faces. We can understand now our Divine Teacher's inaugural message: "Blessed are they that mourn." "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst;" for under his blessed teaching we have learned that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

Thus, my Christian friends, by the words of my text, I open to you a life of endless Gospel activity. First, as a student, you are to come into touch with Jesus. You are to be like your great and Divine Master. This will not be very difficult if you will only come near enough to Christ, if you will only live in his presence, day by day. It has often been said among the alumni of Williams' College that each student who ever lived under the influence of Mark Hopkins had a distinctive stamp placed upon him which marked him as a "Hopkinsite." So, if you live near to Jesus, you will have his stamp upon you. You will become Christlike; you will become "good," or like God. You will not, as did the ignorant country boy, copy a chromo stamped on a daily newspaper page and call that "art." You will be as one who studies a great original masterpiece. Your model will be Jesus. Intuitively, consciously and unconsciously, by walking in his presence, you will absorb his personality in your life.

The second purpose of this text is to send you forth as Gospel evangelists. You are to go up and down the street and preach everywhere the sweet story of Jesus. You are to do this because, if you are true Gospel students, you will as naturally talk about your Divine Teacher as a bird hatched under a songster's wing will sing; as a seed dropped from a rose bush will develop into a rose; as a dewdrop first touched by the morning sun will sparkle like a diamond; as a dying sunset will gild the overhanging clouds with pass[illegible] of gold. May this sermon be the means, under the power of the Holy Spirit, to lead you into the Gospel class-room. May it also be the means of sending you forth, one and all, as Gospel teachers.

A MISSIONARY TOUR IN SOUTH AFRICA

A SOUTH AFRICAN KRAAL

NATIVE BRIDE AND GROOM

OUR NEW NATIVE CHURCH

GOD has been putting his seal on our work in this place. Our old native church, built two years ago, became too small; a new one has been put up; the bricks were made and burnt by the natives themselves. We were sorry to part with the old building, for it meant much to us; over 100 natives professed conversion within its walls; it was more interesting to us than a stately cathedral. We are looking for many conversions in the new and more commodious building.

Some of our early converts are developing into exhorters and are beginning to preach. We give them every opportunity to stir up the gift that is in them. Five native kraals have been opened to the Gospel around us, and our workers visit them and hold regular services.

Recently we took a missionary journey due south of this, with the purpose of opening up new work and visiting some important chiefs. Our first visit was to Zimunya, where we preached and talked to them about the Great Spirit. The chief promised to give heed to the truths of God's Word and to pray. We slept under a great rock with the Southern Cross shining out brilliantly overhead, and had a sense of security, because of God's presence. Supplied with fresh carriers, we passed on to M. Ratsikas kraal, sleeping that night under a large tree. Next morning, at daybreak, the chief came to our encampment and sat on the rock with his councillors and followers. We took the opportunity and preached Jesus; afterwards we went over the ground and selected a spot for a new school, the chief promising to assist in putting it up. From there we passed on through forest, fording rivers, over mountains, visiting kraals, preaching the Word, and praying with the natives.

We were much impressed with Chief M'Tambari He has a large kraal and gave us a hearty welcome. W arrived on Saturday night, and on Sunday morning assembled all his people for service. Unlike some oth chiefs, he permitted the women to come, and for tw hours I was kept on my feet answering questions arisi out of my address.

The doctrine of immortality greatly startled them, f the commoner does not believe in his own immortali but thinks that his chief lives somewhere hereafter.

The result of this missionary trip is the opening t to us of many doors. We are not able to enter many f lack of means.

You will be glad to hear that we have opened up monthly service at Beira. We crave the prayers God's children,

A UNIQUE HOME EXPERIMENT

How a Society of Philadelphia Working Women keep House by the Golden Rule

HER OWN LATCH-KEY

CONTINUOUSLY is the question asked by self-respecting working women: "Where shall we find a home suitable to our needs, and within our means?" The boarding-house was long ago weighed in the balances and found wanting; the "bachelor girl" life in a flat has proved a delusion; and most of the homes designed for working women have almost all been voted unsatisfactory, because of too rigid rules, and the absence of real home atmosphere. It has remained for a little company of self-supporting women of the Quaker city to answer the question, to their own satisfaction at least. They have organized a co-operative housekeeping society. They secured a house which, because it had been the scene of a tragedy, was to be had at a bargain. The members of the society are now living in their new home. There is not a man living in the house; but the twenty-five women who make their home there are not timid mortals. The house is at No. 652 North Fifteenth street, one of the most select districts in Philadelphia, a corner house of four stories, commodious and artistic, and within easy walking distance of the business centre.

At very little expense, the new home was soon put in excellent shape. Woman's wit and characteristic good taste made it look exceeding homelike and attractive. There were cozy corners and snuggeries, and dainty little trappings and decorations such as women love, but there was no ostentatious display. Under their skilled and loving hands, the rooms became very havens of comfort and neatness.

From the president of this unique society, Miss V. Richmont, it was ascertained that the organization started originally with ten women, but the number soon increased, and a larger house was taken. Then so many women asked to be admitted as members that the present large house was purchased, and another rented at 1611 Mount Vernon street, as an overflow home. All the women are wage-earners employed in offices. They have a housekeeper, a cook, a laundress, and a chambermaid. The laundry is all done in the house. Each girl has a latch-key, and each pays board according to the size of her room. The house is run on a home plan. All girls who take lunch to their business places have it put up for them at the home. Any girl who has some pet article of apparel that she wishes to wash herself—a fine waist or expensive handkerchiefs—can go to the laundry and do her own work, just as she would in her own home.

To be admitted to the organization, an applicant must know and be recommended by some one of the members. Then the applicant is allowed to join the little community for a month on probation. At the end of that time, if everything is satisfactory, the probationer becomes a full-fledged member. In the summer the girls can, if they wish, change their residence to Fern Rock, within easy trolley-riding distance of the business section, where the society has a country-hou in a wide stretch of park-like country.

THE BUSINESS WOMEN'S COUNTRY HOME

In discussing the ability of the members to g along successfully without any assistance from a one beyond their own circle, the President, Miss Ric mont, said: "We are all business women. If we we not, we could not have brought th organization through the rocks an shoals that beset us at the start. W should like the women in other citi to know that it is possible on thes lines to provide a comfortable hom for girls who are self-supporting, bu whose parents live far from the city, o who are perhaps orphans. One reasc why we shrink from discussing ou affairs at all is that the world is alway ready to think evil rather than good o any enterprise in which women alon are interested. We have no rules her other than the Golden Rule. We ente tain our friends, if we wish to, in the r ception-room of the house. We are a earning our living in the business worl and most of us are making enough t enable us to live, if we wished, in an of the high-class boarding-houses of th city, but we are more than content t live as we are, owning our home, havin our comfortable country place, manag ing our own affairs, and enjoying pe fect freedom in every way."

War's Horrors IN Macedonia

Thousands of Non-Combatants Massacred

DURING the past week, the situation in Macedonia and along the Bulgarian frontier has become more threatening, and the probabilities of all the Balkan provinces becoming involved in a life-and-death struggle with Turkey are stronger than ever. A great Mohammedan army, estimated at 300,000 under the command of Edhem Pasha, is now in the field. Opposing this host, which is distributed over a wide territory, is an insurgent force of less than 50,000. The campaign thus far has demonstrated the superior activity of the insurgents; but unless they are speedily reinforced, the inevitable result will be the triumph of Turkey, through sheer force of numbers if not through generalship.

Premier Petroff of Bulgaria, it is reported, has informed the representatives in Sofia of the European Powers that neither the Bulgarian Government nor the people "can witness with indifference the annihilation of the Bulgarian element in Macedonia and the devastation of the country, and that unless the Powers can find some means of restraining Turkey's terrible repressive measures, Bulgaria will be forced to depart from her present attitude of strict neutrality." Should this threat be carried out, and Bulgaria declare war, that country would be instantly invaded by the Turkish armies, and all the horrors that have marked the campaign against the insurrection in Macedonia would be duplicated in Prince Ferdinand's territory. So strong is the pressure upon the Bulgarian Cabinet by the people and press that it is not believed war can be much longer averted. Thousands of Bulgarians have crossed the frontier lately, and are now espousing the insurgent cause. Besides these, there is a very large Bulgarian element in the population of the provinces now in revolt, and this element has suffered terribly in the recent massacres by the fanatical Mohammedan troops.

Amid the multitude of rumors coming from the scenes of conflict, it is not always possible to determine what is truth and what falsehood. It was reported that Boris Sarafof, the Macedonian leader, had either been killed in battle or taken prisoner, and that General Zontchieff, the insurgent commander-in-chief, and a soldier of distinguished ability had also fallen. These stories were denied by the Macedonian Committee.

There is a hope that the approaching visit of the Czar to Vienna and the conference of crowned heads which is expected to take place there, may result in such a solution of the present troubles as will bring about a peaceful result. Meanwhile, the condition of affairs in the insurrectionary provinces is appalling. Over 150,000 persons are reported to be helpless and starving. These are mostly Christians, and although the Turkish authorities have promised to afford relief, nothing has been done, and unless aid is somehow afforded, these poor creatures must perish. Every day brings news of some fresh outrage or massacre in Macedonia. A European merchant who left Monastir on Sept. 8, on reaching Sofia, gave to the Associated Press an account of the terrible conditions prevailing in the vilayet of Monastir. He says Hilmi Pasha's administration has greatly disappointed the Christians, who expected that he would make an improvement in the situation. Hilmi Pasha, however, is following the lines of his predecessors, and the greatest excesses that have ever been committed have occurred since his arrival.

Throughout the vilayet the Turkish soldiers are daily perpetrating almost inconceivable atrocities. Women are assaulted, and pillage and murder occur everywhere. Even funeral processions are halted and the corpses stripped of their clothes. The priests' vestments are seized, and the soldiers sell all their plunder openly.

The Christian inhabitants are terror-stricken, hourly fearing a general massacre by the Mussulmans, whose fanatical hatred has reached the highest point. The shops are closed in Monastir, business is suspended, and the streets are deserted. Even the consuls do not dare to venture outside their homes. It is now said that 111 villages have been burned to the ground by the Turks and their population massacred. Terrible stories are circulated of atrocities by the Bashi-Bazouks on helpless women and children.

Fighting between Turks and insurgents has occurred at many points with varying results. Monastir hospitals are filled with Turkish soldiers wounded in these encounters. In the Velas district nearly all the villages have been plundered and destroyed and their inhabitants either slain or imprisoned. Two thousand Turks, with cannon, have retaken Vasiliko on the Black Sea, which was held by a strong force of insurgents. It is roundly estimated that 30,000 persons have been killed in the vilayet of Monastir alone, by Turks, since the war of extermination began, and that 150,000 are hiding in the forests of Macedonia. Palanka, Kratovo and Gotschani and the near-by villages, are being plundered and their people maltreated. Hundreds of unarmed peasants, non-combatants, are being brought to Monastir, in chains by the Turks. One report says: "A husband and wife were sitting in the ruins of their home, when a Turkish soldier slashed off the man's head and threw it in the woman's lap. The soldiers found a servant girl and several children hiding in a ditch. They attacked the girl and slaughtered all the children."

A correspondent of the London Times, writing from Salonica, says: "In the northeast a drive is already in progress, part of the troops starting from Dibra, Krushevo, Okhrida, and Resna, and being supported by the Albanians of Dibra. In the southwest the troops have started from Okhrida and Resna, in order to beat the country between the two lakes, while Albanians block the southern exit."

At Podmochani and Pokoivenik many women and children were killed. In the kazaof Presp a the soldiers surrounded a forest in which the women and children from the villages of Loubotno and Brasolino were concealed. They assaulted the women and put many of them to death. The monastery of St. Goin, in the kaza of Veles, has been plundered. A squadron of Turkish cavalry, which has been operating near the Bulgarian frontier, has intercepted and slaughtered fugitives attempting to cross into Bulgaria. The whole district of Losengrad is filled with Albanian troops, who are burning villages and massacring the inhabitants. Eighty families fleeing from various villages toward the frontier have been literally cut to pieces by Turkish soldiers in the last few days. Hundreds of old men, women, and children of the district of Losengrad have crossed the frontier.

These outrages have maddened the revolutionary leaders, and reprisals are threatened. The insurgents have planned a winter campaign, and will carry widespread devastation into Turkish towns and villages.

On the other hand, the Athens correspondent of the London Times, says "diplomats are agreed that Bulgarian bands exercise greater tyranny and cause more devastation than Turkish troops," adding that "Russia will not permit the creation of an autonomous Macedonia or the appointment of a Christian Governor. She is determined, with the accord of Austria, and the support of other Powers, to pursue the policy of neutrality." Should this be true, and should Turkey be allowed a free hand by the European Powers, the result will be such a crusade of fanaticism as has not been witnessed in a century. The Vienna Freie Presse publishes a story, fabricated elsewhere, to incite the Moslems against the Christians, that the Prophet Mohammed lately rose from his tomb and exclaimed in solemn tones: "Allah, save thy people," whereupon the six eunuchs who were guarding the tomb fell dead from terror. The legend has greatly excited Constantinople.

BULGARIAN OFFICERS NEAR THE BORDER

The Turkish Embassy in London, in its denials, issued daily, of Turkish atrocities, has declared it to be "absolutely false that Ottoman troops were burning villages, the truth being that it was the Bulgarians who, at the approach of the troops, used explosives to burn the villages before leaving them, and then accused the Turkish troops of such abominable deeds."

Turkey has given orders for the reconstruction of the forts on the Bosphorus, and also at Adrianople and Erzeroum. At Beirut, where our American squadron, under Admiral Cotton, now lies, there has been a series of disturbances, resulting in the killing of several Christians and three Turkish soldiers. The Vali of Beirut has been dismissed, and Nadim Pasha, the Vali of Damascus, has been appointed in his place, and there is now comparative quietude. Our fleet, however, will remain to protect American interests. There has been some talk of a demand being made upon the Porte to permit an American warship to pass the Bosphorus for the purpose of affording protection to Americans in Constantinople, but it is useless to speculate on such a contingency. Should it arise, a means would doubtless be found to afford the protection needed.

The Macedonian Cry

IT is a terrible story of the unspeakable horrors of war that comes to us from Macedonia. From those desolated valleys, with their homes a mass of smoking embers and their dead lying unburied; from the forests in which the poor, miserable fugitives are hiding from the fanatical hordes who pursue them; from the caves and holes in those wild and rugged mountains there comes a cry to Christendom for aid. It is a despairing cry from the lips of the 150,000 helpless Christian women and children, non-combatants, who are fleeing from the enemies who are seeking their blood.

From those bleak mountains they can look down upon their old homes, ruined by fire and pillage, their little gardens where, only a few weeks ago, all was peace and happiness, with the children playing at the mother's knee, but where all is now wasted and blackened. War has swept over all, leaving a track of blood and ashes, and a sorrow that none save God can heal.

Will the cry of these 150,000 fugitive and starving women and children in the Macedonian wilds be allowed to pass unheeded? Even should they escape the fanatical foes who are hunting their blood, they will perish of hunger and exposure in the bleak Balkan hills and forests, unless some strong hand reaches out to succor and feed them. Will Europe do this? Europe is at present so intent upon the great game of war now being played in the Balkans, that it has no thought of the sufferers. Besides, were a single European Power to offer a helping hand even to keep the women and children alive, such an offer would be instantly construed as "intervention." Every Power in Europe today is apparently bound, hand and foot, by some treaty or agreement, one indirect result of which is to dam up all human compassion and close the ears of the nations to the call of suffering.

Clearly, then, if the Macedonian cry is to be answered, it must be answered by free and untrammelled Christian America. When Paul, in the first century of the Christian era, saw the vision of the "man of Macedonia" who cried "Come over and help us!" he, obedient to the call, went and gave to the supplicants the "Bread of Life." Deaf indeed must be the ears that do not hear the call of Macedonia for succor to-day; blind must be the eyes that cannot see the vision of those exiles, as they lift their voices in despairing appeal.

Shall the call be answered? We leave the decision with the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Abraham in History

THE hopes entertained by Christian scholars that among the tablets found in the royal libraries of Nippur and other ancient cities, some references might be found corroborating Bible history, appear likely to be fulfilled. These tablets consist of clay inscribed while it was wet and afterwards baked. Thousands of them have been brought to light, and now await the study of scholars able to decipher them. The task will probably occupy many years, but the results will be made known from time to time. Some of them are merely records of business transactions, others of diplomatic correspondence, and others only the examination papers of students in colleges. Great patience is needed for so vast a labor, but it is rewarded by the light it sheds on a civilization now so long extinct.

A report recently issued, announces a fact which, if true, has extraordinary value. It is that among the tablets, one has been found engraved on both sides by a Parthian scribe, which contains an incidental reference to Abraham. It describes the incursion of a tribe of Elamites, who ravaged the country far and wide. They destroyed the pastures, and turned the gardens and groves into camping grounds for their troops. The country had become a desert, and the agriculturists and owners of flocks and herds were obliged to migrate to obtain pasture for their cattle. Among these exiles, Abraham, and his family and servants are mentioned. There is nothing improbable in such a reference. The Biblical narrative describes him as a man of substance, and one likely to be conspicuous among a company of emigrants. It would, therefore, be quite consistent for a reporter of those days to take note of the departure of such a man as an evidence of the desolation of the country.

The tablet on which it is said to have been inscribed, was found in the library of the great temple at Baalarat Nippur, which was originally built in 3,800 B. C., and rebuilt about 1,300 B. C., after having been destroyed in some social convulsion. The birth of Abraham, according to the received chronology, was about 2,000 B.C., so that the records contained in the library, would more than cover the period of his life. The value of the discovery is particularly timely just now, because of the persistent effort of sceptics to disprove the personality of the patriarchs. They contend that they were mythical beings, and probably merely tribal names, having no actual personality. This tablet, should the report prove correct, will set all such theories at rest. We shall await with interest fuller reports of this most important discovery.

Looking Back

LOOKING back over a few seasons or years, what changes we note, that at the moment of their occurrence produced no deep impression. A tall young man, or a beautiful girl looms on the scene, and it seems but yesterday that either was a child making mud-pies and fishing in a brook. Some people spend so much time theorizing on the education of their children, that before they know it, the children have shot into maturity, with a haphazard training that must answer its purpose, since it is all they can ever receive.

At least this is the way it looks to some of us, glancing backward. There are faces we miss in church, at the sociable, on the street. What has become of them? Some have gone to the Philippines, some to China, some to heaven. The whole landscape of life is altered every year or two. Scenes are forever shifted. What is our great comfort? Is it not distilled by the psalmist in a single phrase, "Thou art the same and thy years shall not fail."

When Summer Boarders Go

WITH the early autumn, the summer boarders hurry home to town, and country housewives foot up the profit and loss of the season. When they are able to set aside a tidy sum toward reducing the mortgage on the farm or paying the expenses of the boy at college, the hard-worked and tired women, who have had hot kitchens and steaming laundries for their portion of the summer's joy, breathe a sigh of deep thankfulness. They have not had their labor for naught, and they are satisfied. Often it has been impossible for them to secure domestic help. Three meals a day, for ten, twenty, thirty or forty, fastidious, exacting and hungry people, boarders, disposed to be fault-finding over any defect, unwilling to make excuses when meat was tough, or vegetables sparse, ah, these meals have told heavily on the housekeeper's nerves and vigor.

Now, when she waves her boarders a friendly good-bye at the door, and they drive away in a gale of good spirits, promising to return next year, let the lady of the manor, wherever she is, take a much needed resting-spell. Let her persuade John to go off for a few days' drive over the hills with his wife. Let her pay a visit or two. Let her sit down and fold her hands. For a while, after the boarders go, the farmer's wife should rest, doing only what cannot be left undone, and inviting autumn to bless her, as summer blessed her guests.

Zionism in Prophecy

THE offer by Great Britain of a tract of land in Africa, two hundred miles in length, for the use of a colony of Jews, is one of the strangest developments of Zionism. The popular idea of the new movement focussed in the return to Palestine. All reason and sentiment combined to make the Holy Land the only available site for the chosen people to occupy as their home. But as Dr. Herzl and Israel Zangwill point out, much would be gained if the Jews possessed anywhere some central territory that was distinctively Jewish. Now, the Jews are a race scattered among the nations, and there is no capital, no home of the people; but if they had a land that they could call their own, even though under the suzerainty of a great Power, they would count once again among the nations and could exercise an influence on behalf of their scattered co-religionists. Of course, Palestine would be the ideal home; but failing that, or while waiting for the inevitable dismemberment of the Turkish Empire, a home or headquarters in some other land, would be a distinct advantage. There they could have their own laws and social customs, could worship in their own way and be under their own elected governors. They would, in Africa, be under the suzerainty of England, but in return, they would enjoy British protection and have the advantage of British commercial connections. The idea, which at first sight, seemed an almost grotesque development of Zionism, seems, on mature consideration, to possess recommendations of great practical value.

It is a remarkable coincidence, if nothing more, that there is in prophecy a hint of some such arrangement. It cannot be said that there is a distinct prophecy of a Jewish state in Africa, but when we remember in how many cases the prophets referred vaguely to a situation or event which they did not themselves understand, and which became significant only when history had interpreted it, the prediction is worthy of consideration. In writing of the doom of Egypt, Isaiah says (19: 18-20): "In that day shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan and swear to the Lord of Hosts. One shall be called the City of Destruction [marg. of the Sun]. In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the midst of the land of Egypt and a pillar at the border thereof to the Lord. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto the Lord of Hosts in the land of Egypt: for they shall cry unto the Lord because of the oppressors, and he shall send them a Saviour and a great one and he shall deliver them." It is a significant fact that the Jewish cry under the oppressions of Russia should have elicited from the Power controlling Egypt, an offer of a region in proximity to Egypt, in which more than the five cities enumerated by the prophet might be built, the inhabitants of which would speak the language of Canaan. We have yet to learn what decision the Zionists will reach with respect to the British offer, but that it has been favorably considered is evident from the fact that a committee has been appointed to go to Africa and report on available sites.

IN THE LUMBER CAMP

SEE ILLUSTRATION ON FIRST PAGE

ANY one who has not visited a lumber camp has missed one of the most picturesque of American industries. Every season the strong, stalwart men gather at the camps in the forests of the Northwest, and all through the next few months the wholesome, healthy labor goes on. The giants of the woods, so many years in reaching maturity, fall under axe and saw, and are trimmed and piled, ready for transit by river or sled to the mills. Such appetites as the men get in that glorious air are seldom seen elsewhere. The horn or the bugle that calls them from their labor to the shanty where the tables are set is the most welcome music that echoes through the forest. In the evening, when sunset puts an end to the day's work, they are almost too tired even for amusement or talk. Occasionally there is a good story-teller in the gang who can keep the men awake; or there is some one with a violin or a mandolin who can start the men singing, but it does not last long. Each bunk soon has its occupant, and good, sound, healthy sleep reigns in the shanty. They are of all nationalities, these strong men who come to the camps, knowing how hard the work will be, and enjoying the prospect of it. Germans, Norwegians, Russians, besides Americans and Canadians, are generally to be found among them, and there is often a queer mixture of languages with a basis of more or less broken English for common use. The late Mr. Gibbud used to declare that among them he found more manly honesty and bluff good-feeling than in any class he had tried to reach. His memory is still cherished in many of the camps, and his kindly visits are among their reminiscences. It was due to his efforts and to those of his colleagues that many of the lumbermen carried the money they had earned back to their homes, instead of spending so much of it in the saloons and gambling resorts of the city on their way home. In these camps, rough as the men sometimes are, the Gospel of Christ had its invariable power, and many were brought from darkness to light.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

India's Venerated City

ON the west bank of the sacred river Ganges, at the point where it emerges from the Himalayan mountains, stands the venerated city of Hurdwar or Vishnu's Gate, a city of immense antiquity. This year it is the goal to which fully two million pilgrims from all parts of India are painfully wending. It is the sacred year of the Kumbh-mela, which occurs at intervals of twelve years. The ordinary population is about eight thousand, but at the great festival, the old city is thronged, and the Harike-paran or bathing-ghat, connected with the famous temple of Gangadwara, is thronged with people who come to wash away their sins in the sacred river. The merchants turn the festival to account, by holding at the same time and place a huge fair, at which commodities of every kind are on sale. On the wall of the bathing-ghat, to which every pilgrim repairs, is a stone bearing the imprint of a foot, which the pious Hindoo is taught to believe is the impression of the foot of Vishnu himself. It is duly reverenced, and each pilgrim pays it devout homage. They have a tradition that one more incarnation of Vishnu will take place, when he will appear on a white horse, and with the sword which he will wear, he will take vengeance on the wicked and prepare the world for renovation.

In the meantime, the Hindoo washes in the river, and having performed his ablution and made such purchases in the fair as he can afford, turns his face homeward to await the recurrence of the next festival. When one thinks of the immense number of people who are under the delusion of this miserable superstition, one rejoices that the missionaries are now spreading abroad the knowledge of Christ, and that in a short time the orphans whom our readers are supporting, will be scattered through the country, carrying with them the knowledge of that water which can do for the believer infinitely more than all the waters of the Ganges.

The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life (John 4:14).

THE BATHING PLACE AT THE SACRED CITY OF HURDWAR ON THE GANGES

Men Reverting to Apes

A report reaches Melbourne, Australia of a remarkable tribe having been discovered on the island of Papua, in British New Guinea. According to the Australian papers, the tribe has been made the subject of Government investigation, and an expedition is being organized for a scientific study of their condition. It appears that the region they inhabit was once dry and fertile, but owing to volcanic changes, was turned into an immense marsh, by the diversion of the course of a river. It was always densely wooded, but after it grew marshy, there sprang up a thick undergrowth which could not be penetrated. The inhabitants constructed their dwellings on the low branches of huge trees, and could pass, after long practice, from one part of the forest to another without putting their feet to the ground. They lived on wild animals, birds, and fruits that they found, and abandoned all attempts to cultivate the soil. Reports of their degradation reached the Governor, who sent men to visit them. One of the strange tribe was captured. No one could understand his strange speech. He was in all respects like an ape, wore no clothing, was covered with soft hair, and, though evidently human, had the lower extremities developed, and the arms long like the apes. The trunk was enormously large in proportion to the limbs. His physical strength was prodigious, but he could not walk easily, though he could run along the branches of trees, and leap from limb to limb, like a monkey. He made his escape from his captors, and climbing a tree with wonderful agility, was soon out of reach. When more is learned of these poor Papuans, it will doubtless be found that they have degenerated mentally as well as physically. No one can acquire the habits of the brutes without losing the higher attributes of manhood. Yet those who live only for the indulgence of carnal appetites, forget that they are forfeiting their birthright.

If ye live after the flesh ye shall die; but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live (Rom. 8:13).

Rich, But Starving

A pitiful story is told by a traveler who arrived at Tacoma, Wash., from Alaska recently. In passing through Tanan County, he says he met several prospectors who were in urgent need of food. One of them had eaten nothing in several days. All were extremely weak. They had plenty of money and gold dust, but were so far from any place where they could purchase food, that they were absolutely starving. They might have got away earlier in the season, but now it is impossible. He left all the provisions he could spare as a free gift. The men were eager to pay for them, and showed him that there was no lack of money among them; but, as they sadly said, they could not eat money, and there was no one with any food to sell. The traveler expressed his conviction that not less than a hundred will die of starvation before the winter is over, though they all have money or gold dust, which, if they were in a city, would suffice to support them comfortably for a long time. Some of them said that there was plenty of gold within reach, but they were too weak to get it, and too indifferent to care about it. Food was what they needed, and their wealth was of no concern to them. This is only one of many instances on record of the failure of money to satisfy human need. Those who make its acquisition the chief object of life forget that, useful as it is, there are better possessions which they may have.

Money is a defense: but the excellence of knowledge is that wisdom giveth life to them that have it (Eccles. 7:12).

An Automatic Buoy

An ingenious arrangement has just been completed for the automatic illumination of buoys placed along the coast to warn mariners of dangerous rocks. A practical application of it has been made in the harbor of Hamburg, and is pronounced a complete success. Formerly each buoy was supplied with a reservoir of oil, which burned night and day, and a ship was kept in constant service renewing the oil. Later, a miniature gas tank was placed in the buoy, and that, too, had to be replenished at frequent intervals. The new invention consists in extinguishing the light in the day-time and lighting it at night, when it is required. It is done by means of a cell of the new metal selenium, which has the property of becoming an electric conductor in the light and a non-conductor in the dark. The cell is placed between magnets in the buoy, so as to open a valve when the selenium ceases to be a conductor and to close the valve when the selenium, affected by the light, again becomes a conductor. Thus the gas burns only at night and does not require an frequent renewing. It is lighted by an electric spark, and is automatically extinguished when the sun rises. The strange property of this new metal is thus turned to account and becomes the means of saving waste. It is a peculiar property in a metal, but unhappily it is common enough in humanity. There are many men who, when the sun of prosperity shines upon them, are conspicuous at spiritual prayer, but in the darkness of adversity cease to work in the Lord's service.

Those become cast who for a while believe and in time of temptation fall away (Luke 8:13).

Finding Hidden Treasure

A dispatch from Savannah, Ga., gives a strange story of successful treasure seekers. An old man and his son arrived there a few weeks ago and made arrangements for a sail on Warsaw Island, three miles off. They made various excuses for their visit, but none of them was credited. To one man, whose assistance was necessary for the expedition, they told a story which is accepted as true. It is, that while living in Philadelphia they assisted an old sailor, who was ill and penniless. They were sorry for the man and gave him free board and bedding, and when he grew worse, provided medical assistance for him. The sailor continued sick and was finally given up by the doctors. Before he died, he called his benefactors to his bedside, and bade them open the trunk he had brought with him. There, on the parchment of an old drum, a map had been roughly drawn. He showed them on the map a marked spot at which he said money and jewels were buried. He had made several efforts to get the treasure but had always been prevented. He wished the people who had been kind to him to have the treasure, since he was unable to secure it. After his death, Talbot and son made the trip to Warsaw Island. Several later visits were paid, and after one of these the visitors suddenly disappeared and it is believed, from inquiries as to their baggage that they took the treasure with them. If they really did find and secure the treasure, they owe it to their faith in that old drum-head record. If people would only be induced to exercise such faith in the Word of God, how much treasure they might obtain!

The word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it (Heb. 4:2).

DISTRIBUTING "CHRISTIAN HERALD" RELIEF AMONG THE FAMINE-STRICKEN CHINESE, IN A CONFUCIAN TEMPLE AT KWAI-PING

Photographed specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

How Our Relief was Welcomed in Kwang-Si

IT is gratifying to be able to record the fact that the great famine in Kwang-Si Province, China, to relieve which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers contributed most generously, is now at an end. This news comes in an official communication conveyed to this journal through our State Department in Washington. Consul-General McWade, the American representative at Canton, writing to Hon. Francis B. Loomis, Assistant Secretary of State, under date of July 11, last, conveys an official expression of gratitude from Viceroy Tsen and Fantai Ting for the final contribution of $10,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the relief-work. The Consul-General's letter adds, that the arrival of this generous donation by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, "was exceedingly timely, and will enable me, through means of the Third American Relief Expedition, to successfully round out the famine relief work in all of the stricken districts of Kwang-Si. When I notified their Excellencies, Viceroy Tsen and Provincial Treasurer Ting, they were overjoyed, and their expressions of gratitude were both heartfelt and frequent. They said that this was another of the many instances of the sincerity of American friendship for the Chinese Empire, and they asked me to say to you, and through your courtesy, to the President of the United States, how profoundly appreciative they are of that friendship, and to assure President Roosevelt and Your Honor that they will hold America's kindness in life-long remembrance. They also asked me to cable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its contributors, their deep and lasting appreciation of the great charity they had shown."

The Consul-General forwards with his letter, a report by Rev. H. O. T. Burkwall, of the British and American Bible Society, giving many interesting details concerning the second Relief Expedition, a full account of which appeared in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. He also encloses a report of the relief operations of the A. C. M. A. missionaries of South China. "In recognition of the splendid charity of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its contributors, I have the honor to ask you to furnish that excellent journal with such extracts as you may think of public interest and proper for it to publish."

In his report, Dr. Burkwall says:

I remained in Ping Nam for a few days to assist in the distribution. The need is great about this centre. The distribution has been going on in a large Examination Hall. On the two last days for general distribution, the sights were simply pitiful. What touched me most were the great number of starved babies and children. The sights beggar description. Men and women, with greatly swollen feet and hands; their emaciated forms, nearly dead with starvation; and the strongly-built, who, because of hunger, could scarcely totter to get their pound of rice. Arriving at Ping Nam, we learned that thousands of children have been sold from this district. The people have subsisted on mulberry leaves, roots, and grass.

Rev. Henry Zehr, of Wuchow (C. and M. A. Missionary), gives a most realistic picture of the scenes of suffering in certain parts of Kwang-Si province. He writes:

The district affected extended over a distance of 300 miles in length along the West River, from Ping Nam on the east to beyond Nam Ning Fu on the west, and varying in width. It has been estimated that at least 350,000 have suffered. Perhaps the most needy section was around Kwai Ping, a Fu city, where two of our missionaries, Rev. J. E. and Mrs. Fee, are stationed. The great increase in the number of people begging on the streets, and the frequency with which parents brought their children for sale, were evidences that the famine was upon us. Our missionaries seeing this great need, as early as February, began giving help in a quiet way, little thinking of the extent to which the work might develop. At first a few potfuls of rice gruel daily sufficed to satiate the hunger of those gathered in the Gospel chapel. But the crowds soon outgrew the chapel, when the Magistrate granted the use of the grounds of the Emperor's temple, and later on, when this place became too small, the Confucian temple grounds, with accommodations for 50,000 people.

At the beginning, to prevent those coming who were not absolutely needy, we gave only cooked rice, some days cooking as much as two piculs (one picul equals 133 pounds). Later on, as the need became more evident, they were given their choice of either dry or cooked rice. But as the weather became warmer we saw it impracticable to continue with the rice gruel, except to have a little on hand for small children and very weak people. When the doors were opened the crowds were closely scrutinized, and only needy persons were admitted. When all had passed into the inner inclosure the distribution began. As they passed out every man, woman and child was given a ticket, which they exchanged for rice at the door. The very destitute, old, blind, and mothers with nursing children, were given two or more tickets, according to their apparent need.

At the beginning, the need was met by our missionaries and when their means were exhausted help began to come from different sources. A subscription was taken by the foreigners in Wuchow; missionaries from other societies gave liberally; the Hon. R. McWade, U. S. Consul-General started a subscription in Canton, and also made an appeal to which the American people quickly responded. Not only were we enabled to give relief at Kwai Ping, but five other centres were opened, viz.: Kwai Un, Nam Ning, Wing Shun, Ping Nam and Lau Chau.

With each distributing day the number of those who came for rice increased, and with the increase the work also became more laborious; but here again missionaries from Kwang Tung province responded to an appeal for workers and rendered timely and efficient service. At Kwai Ping as many as fifteen and twenty thousand people were present in one day, and at Ping Nam from eight to ten thousand.

The scenes, especially at the beginning, were heartrending. Many were much emaciated—nothing but mere skeletons. Others came with their face, hands and feet greatly swollen by reason of either a lack of or improper food. To many help has come in time, and on the small, but regular portion of rice received, we have seen them steadily improving. Others were too far gone, and after dragging themselves wearily to the relief grounds for a few days, even when special help was given them, it was to no avail. They have died at our doorstep, by the road-side, in the sheds on the city wall, and a few died in the distributing grounds while waiting for their portion.

The writer then gives some shocking but apparently well-authenticated instances of cannibalism. He then proceeds:

Thousands of people disposed of everything salable, such as household furniture, cattle, the roofs off their houses, and some tore down the very walls of their dwelling and sold the bricks for food. Thousands of women and children were sold at the beginning of the famine, and this does not necessarily mean that they did not love them. Many of them were heartbroken, but they said: "If we keep them, they and we will starve, while if we sell them, they will be fed, and the money they bring will enable us to live a little longer." Such children were almost daily brought to us in the hope that the foreigner would give a high price, but we always refused to buy. When, however, parents unable to keep their children, offered them freely to us, we felt led to take them in, and now we have over thirty of such under our care. For about one-half of these we have writings, giving us the authority to rear and educate them. Others, have been left with us until harvest, which is now almost over, and they will soon return to their parents, who are again in a position to care for them. They are a happy, grateful lot of children and we hope all may be brought to a saving knowledge of the Truth as it is in Christ Jesus.

The general distribution has ceased, and ten missionaries are now going through the country and villages seeking out the needy families, to give them a new start in life. Many expressions of gratitude and thankfulness come to us from the lips of those whom we have been enabled to relieve through the generous gifts that were placed at our disposal. Not only have thousands of lives been saved, but the hearts of the people have been opened to receive the Glad Message of Salvation. The Gospel has been given along with the rice and has entered into some hearts, and, we believe, ere long will yield a rich harvest of souls.

✻ CLOSING DAYS AT OUR CHILDREN'S HOME ✻

SEPTEMBER, whose cooling breezes have already driven home from mountain and seashore the multitudes whose means enabled them to pass the heated summer days in those cool retreats, has warned our happy little tenement children at our Mont-Lawn home that their season's outing is drawing to a close. Up to the end of the first week in September, over two thousand tenement children had been sheltered, cared for and instructed at the Home during the present season. This great army of little ones, representing every degree of poverty and hardship, has been brought from dingy tenement homes into the sunshine of Christian love for a brief season; and in these few months the seed has been sown that will find blossom and fruitage in Christian character during the coming years.

Two thousand pairs of little feet, some shod, others bare and brown, forever patterning across the piazzas or racing up and down the grassy walks: two thousand pairs of little hands, ever busy, teasing, pulling flowers, picking nuts; two thousand little voices, rising to our Heavenly Father in prayer, morning and evening, or ringing their childish songs of pleasure, or shrieking with merry laughter in play from dawn till long past sunset—how we shall miss them! The Home will be doubly silent after the last group of children have gone. The birds and the squirrels too will miss them, for our children were wondrously kind to and fond of all living creatures.

Their pleasures have not been limited to the precincts of the Home, but they have taken long strolls over the surrounding country, gathering berries, fruit and anything the young marauders could appropriate without harm to themselves or to others. They will remember in the coming winter days all those summer joys—the Saturday games, the bean hunts, the races, the cane contests, the fun and frolic of the "glorious Fourth," with the music and marches, and the rally around the Flag. And they will remember the sweet rest of the nights, when tucked in their little white cots by tender hands, they slept until the sweet carol of the birds awoke them.

A WEE TENEMENT MAID

Here are two letters written by little girls, in which they describe their experiences at Mont-Lawn:

Tell Michael that I have lots of apples, pears and nuts to bring him. It has been kind of cool up here mornin's, but we have you one of the butiful flowers in our garden. There's lots of kinds. May be I can bring another kind when I come home. Good by, KITTY.

Dear Mama: We will soon be home. We have lots of fun here and everything is clean and nice, never no dirt in the house, and the nice warm blankets, and on the west side are white spreads which makes the cottage look nice. We have white ones bed, and they ain't no camps, but you can have them to go up and down. We don't eat make our own beds, we have ladies up here for that purpose.

On Labor Day, we had races, bean games and canes. I won two races and I got ten cents for them, and I got two beans, and I got two cents for them, and I guess I won two whips, but Hugh broke won off me. We had ice cream and cake on the lawn, we marched around with soldier caps, tell Peter I have a soldier cap and a whip with a whistle on for him. The money I winned will get some more milk for the baby. I send you some flowers in our garden. There's lots of kinds. May be I can bring another kind when I come home. Good by, KITTY.

Dear Mama: We will soon be home. We have lots of fun here and everything is clean and nice, never no dirt in the house, and the beds are warm as the toast. We have good things to eat, and everything taste good to me. The Dennison people sent us a box and we got candy and some crackers and apples. I hope possible there I can. You all want to stay longer, but we can come next summer.

LIZA.

The last group leaves will soon be made, and the last load of children will leave Mont-Lawn, laden with bouquets of wild flowers and shouting until out of sight, and breaking into songs which they have learned at the Home. In some future year, some of these same little ones will come to Mont-Lawn, tall and womanly grown, and will tell how the outing they spent there in early had given to them a happier view of life than they could ever have had otherwise, and had helped them to become good, upright, Christian men and women. This summer, six fine looking young men were among the visitors at Mont-Lawn. They introduced themselves modestly, and told the Housemother that seven or eight years ago they were among the numbers of poor tenement boys who had been brought to the Home. They recalled their outing with pleasure, and declared that it had produced a marked influence in shaping and transforming their lives.

Every reader is invited to have a share in the Mont-Lawn work. Three dollars sends a tenement child to our Fresh-Air Home for ten days. Contributions should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York City.

SIGHTLESS, YET A SOUL-WINNER

EVEN the most conservative Christian, who observes the religious life of our country to-day, will admit that there is among different evangelical communions a growing and widespread interest in the non-church going and unsaved multitudes. The tent and open-air meetings in progress now for the fifth season in Philadelphia, have given impetus and inspiration to the present awakening in widely separated parts. This work is carried on and supported by the Presbyterians of Philadelphia and vicinity, under the management of a large and efficient committee of the clergy and laymen. The Chairman of the General Committee is John H. Converse, LL.D. Although the work is supported and managed by Presbyterians, the evangelists belong to different denominations. At least four of them are Baptists.

In a single week, before the work had gotten fully under way for the season, one hundred meetings were held in tents, in the old Second Street Market, in public squares, on the piers along the river front, and in front of City Hall and Independence Hall. At the latter two places the services are held from 12:15 to 1:00 p.m. At the open-air meetings, at night, the speakers use stereopticons. Protestants, Romanists and Jews mingle in these outdoor meetings, and the children, at least, of all these, join in singing hymns. In these places "the glorious Gospel of the blessed Saviour" is brought to multitudes, among which are many people who have no church connections and also seldom, if ever, attend a church service. In nearly all cases, excellent order is maintained without the aid of officers. In these, many a backslider is brought back to his first-love, and many an unbeliever is brought to repentance and faith.

THE BLIND EVANGELIST HOLDING A GOSPEL SERVICE IN FRONT OF INDEPENDENCE HALL

It is an impressive sight to see the hundreds of men, young and old, some of them elegantly dressed some in the garb of the work shop, or, as is often the case, in shabby costume, stand side by side with uncovered and reverently bowed heads, while the preacher, lay or ordained, talks to God on their behalf. No statistician can tabulate the results of the tent and outdoor meetings. Of the evangelists who have been engaged in the work in Philadelphia this summer, one of the most remarkable is Rev Thomas Houston, known as the "blind evangelist." He is a man in the prime of life. His commanding presence and fine voice give effectiveness and impressiveness to the Word, which he uses with apt and earnest power. He preaches the Gospel straight to the intellect, the heart, the conscience and the will of the people who assemble to hear him. He is a great soul-winner. His appeals are often marvelous in their sanctified pathos.

DAVID WINTERS.

JUDGMENT AND MERCY * DAVID BRINGS UP THE ARK

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 4
II. SAMUEL 6: 1-12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- PSA. 84: 4:
"BLESSED ARE THEY THAT DWELL IN THY HOUSE."

GOD'S judgment and mercy are in this lesson set side by side, in due proportion, as a divine example for every godly man. The Ark, which is the centre of the story, contained with other things, the stone tables of the Law, the Ten Commandments, given by God at Sinai, which are the embodiment of justice; but its lid was the blood-sprinkled Mercy-Seat, symbol of the merciful atonement, which brooding cherubim "desire to look into."

I. JUDGMENT. This age needs a stronger sense of justice, a deeper appreciation of the importance of exact obedience to law, such as the tragedy of this lesson is adapted to give. God had prescribed exactly how the sacred Ark should be moved (Numbers 4:5-12; 7:9). It was to be carried by men, not oxen, and no "new cart" or any other new way, could take the place of God's way. When David determined to bring the Ark to Jerusalem, he should have looked up the law, and so should Uzzah and all concerned. Uzzah was sincere in all he did, but suffered, nevertheless, for disobeying a law he should have known. Of course, the oxen shook the Ark, because that would otherwise happen, God had ordered it to be carried another way. Uzzah sought to steady the Ark, and so touched it. To teach obedience, God had forbidden that. When Uzzah died for his disobedience, it showed God's high estimate of reverence and of exact obedience to his law—a solemn warning to the many who think irreverence and even profanity only a foible, and count it enough to be "average honest" "about night." The tragedy shows how important it is to know the will of God, and, knowing it, to do it exactly. Sincerity is no saviour. We are not spared, because we offend in ignorance, if we might and should have known. It is our business to study Scripture and nature to know the will of God. With most of us to-day, it is not through lack of knowledge, but in spite of it, that we disobey God and bring ourselves into judgment here and hereafter.

Uzzah's death and many a similar judgment, refute the sentimental saying that "God is too good to punish." That he has put awful punishment on disobedience in the past, is the best assurance that he will punish sin exactly as he has said he would, in the future. It would be wholesome to review in these days, in brief, some of the judgments of God in the six thousand years of human history: The expulsion of Adam and Eve from Eden, for what seems to our dull consciences a small disobedience; the curse put upon Cain for pride, that led to envy, which led to murder; the flood, that blotted out the wicked and their families, and gave the world a new start; the flood of fire that burned out corrupt Sodom and Gomorrah; the extermination of the Canaanites, who had made adultery their religion, and so had to be excised from the earth like a cancer; the frequent deliverance of sinning Israel into the hands of enemies; the seventy years' captivity, in which Israel was punished for trampling on the Seventh Day; the destruction of Jerusalem, opening the long tragedy of "the wandering Jew." Surely it is "an awful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." It is an "awful thing" for a sinful man, or a sinful nation, even in this world. Why should we think his warnings about future punishment will not be made good?

Justice in God

"SO DAVID AND ALL THE HOUSE OF ISRAEL BROUGHT UP THE ARK OF THE LORD WITH SHOUTING"

In our own characters, if we are to be Godlike or Godly, justice must stand in due proportion to mercy. There are too many ready to send bouquets to murderers, to sign applications for the pardon of criminals because their relatives cry and tease. Especially are we too ready to excuse our own faults. Can we get at the root of this common defect in character? A part of the trouble is lack of breadth in our thinking. We let our emotions rule us, when head, heart and will should act together as a triumvirate of Judges, after considering all sides of the case. Especially are we in danger of considering only the individual, and forgetting the people at large. We pity the prisoner whose life or liberty is to be taken from him because of crime, especially if his mother or wife or baby is dramatically or otherwise introduced to play on our feelings. We forget those he has wronged, and those he is likely to wrong if forgiven, and especially do we forget that it will encourage others to do wrong if there is too much mercy and too little justice. The frequent Bible word, "righteousness," commonly thought of as meaning religiousness, the "imputed righteousness," of Christ, usually means rightness and love of right, the sense of justice, which is the bedrock of all true religiousness."

Justice in Man

This tragedy of Uzzah was a Kipling "Recessional," expressed in deeds more solemn than words. David climaxed his coronation by marshaling his officers and soldiers in a great procession of thirty thousand men, that brought the ark of God to his capital with glad songs that made the king dance for joy. But in the pageant all had forgotten God's law for such a case, and a tragedy wrote in blood the warning, "Lest we forget." Not England only but the United States, and all the prosperous and powerful, whether nations or individuals, need to be reminded of God's forgotten laws.

David's "Recessional"

> The tumult and the shouting dies—
> The Captains and the Kings Depart—
> Still stands thy ancient sacrifice,
> An humble and a contrite heart.
> Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

The most puzzling problem of this story, which will crowd out everything else in some classes, if teachers do not prevent, is that Uzzah was stricken down for unconscious disobedience when sincerely endeavoring to do right. This old but ever new question of salvation by sincerity was years ago conclusively discussed by the Sunday School Times, in the query column, as follows:

Sincere Evil Doers

Question: "If a man believes and does what he sincerely thinks to be right, will he be saved? A certain Bible commentary says, 'No, I can not see how it is possible to do anything more than what one thinks right. Shall one do what he thinks wrong?' That is the only alternative."

Answer: "Both in the Bible and out of it we are taught that ignorance is no sure protection from the evil consequences of misdoing. If a child or a man thinks that a bottle of deadly poison contains a health-giving draught, he is as likely to lose his life as if he meant to commit suicide. Taking a road, in the darkness, that leads over a precipice, will not bring a man safely home because he thinks it will. Even the loving Jesus taught that the servant who knew not his master's will and did it not, was to be beaten, although with fewer stripes than the one who acted against light. 'Shall one do what he thinks wrong? That is the only alternative.' No, no, no! One should know what is right, and do that. That is the alternative. It is one's duty, under the government of God and of man to know what he ought to do, and to do it. And we must heed the injunction of our Lord, 'Look therefore whether the light that is in thee be not Darkness.' 'If . . . the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is the darkness!' Ignorance is no safeguard. This should be our constant incentive to study and prayer and striving."

Exact obedience is also solemnly taught by Uzzah's death, and it is a lesson needed to-day by old and young when so much is made of "liberty" and so little of law in home and school and street. At the battle of Waterloo, a certain officer, with a small company of picked men, was sent by the Duke of Wellington to guard and hold a certain bridge. They had not long been there when they heard the sound of guns, and soon their ears told them that a fierce battle was raging. Officers and men grumbled. "Fighting going on, and we not there," said they. "The Duke needs all the men he can get, yet here we are doing nothing!"

Unquestioning Obedience

At last the officer gave orders to go and join the fray, and joyfully did his men obey. Just as they arrived, they saw that the enemy was in full flight. Also that many of them were making for the bridge that they had left unguarded!

Hastily they returned, but it was too late. The enemy were in possession, and knowing its value to the retreating army, they defended it well. The Duke had special reasons for placing good soldiers at that point, but the officers and men felt sure he had made a mistake, and that they could arrange things better. Obedience to orders was disregarded, with the results we have seen. St. Peter bids believers, "as obedient children" (I. Peter 1:14), to do various things. Are we not often inclined to imitate the officer and men at Waterloo, who were sure they knew better than their commander?

Best of all illustrations of obedience is a fresh one showing how the proudest of emperors learned to obey a pilot who knew his rights, and knowing dared maintain. It is tol that Emperor William of Germany, in a fit of impatienc because the speed of his yacht was slowed in entering a ce tain harbor, came into conflict with the pilot, an old No wegian named Nordhuus, who knew the dangerous character the channel, and that faster speed might cause a wreck. Th Emperor tried to take charge, and rang the bell for full spee Nordhuus placed himself in the way, and, leaning over th wheel, called down the tube to the engine-room, "Ha speed. Never mind the bell!" "You countermand m orders!" cried the Emperor, giving the bell another jeri "Disregard the bell!" called Nordhuus through the tu unmoved. The Emperor glared at the pilot a moment, an then drawing himself up stiffly, said majestically, "Go belo and report yourself under arrest." "Leave the bridge!" re sponded Nordhuus grimly, grasping the wheel more firml "This ship is in my charge, and I'll have no interference wit my orders from King or seaman!" The officers of the dec hurried silently aft, wishing well to the pilot. Nordhuus ha the law as well as common sense on his side, and stood his post, unshaken by threats, unheeding commands, an carried the royal yacht safely into the harbor.

The next day the Emperor came to his senses and deco ated the pilot with one grade of the Order of the Blac Eagle, and made him his life pilot for Norwegian waters.

A greater reward awaits the Christian of fearless obed ence—a crown of life. They that fully obey shall eternally rul

II. MERCY.—In almost every chapter of the Bible th tells of judgment there is also a message of mercy. So i this chapter, while Uzzah dies for his disobed ence, the home of Obed-Edom, where David, i fear and displeasure left the ark after Uzzah death, was signally blest because the ark of Go was in it, as was David's house also, when, in a desire f such blessings he took later to Jerusalem—bot picturing the blessing that come to homes i every age where a "fan ily altar" is cherishe Many a divorce migh have been prevented b the daily worship thi brings swift reconciliatio of estranged parents. is hard to carry a quarr of parents and childre past the hour of praye At such a time we reca the words of Christ. " thou bring thy gift to th altar and there remen berest that thy brothe hath aught against the first be reconciled to th brother." The home alta heads off many hear breaks by keeping li pure for husband and chi dren who go forth with it sacred spell on them int the perils of the street And there is much le chance for souring th table talk with bitte words to or about other when the meal begins wit grateful acknowledgmer of a present God. If fathe is too diffident to pray i his own words let one o all say the Lord's Praye And at table, where th father feels unequal to a extemporaneous grace, let all sing or say the very appropr ate doxology. A well-known clergyman has said that h father's tone and manner in the conduct of family praye affected his estimate of the Christian religion beyond almos anything in the recollections of his boyhood.

Home Worship

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, Author of "In His Steps":

There are two essentials for a permanent Republic. The first is a pure, living religion, which puts into daily practice the teaching of Jesus Christ. And the second is a true home life, where father, mother and children spend much time together; where family worship is preserved; where honesty, purity and mutual affection are developed. Give us these two things and we can save and maintain the Republic.

In a family where the father does not go once in two year to church, and has no confidence in religion, the mother ha maintained the family altar from the first, with a large famil of children, every one of whom has followed the mother int the Church. A lady said to her husband, when the mar riage ceremony was performed, I want to ask one privilege that is to always pray in family worship, while you are ur converted. It was granted, and the man is to-day a loca preacher. In England and Scotland it is commonly estimate that daily household prayer is maintained in at least half o the families of professing Christians, and when domesti servants are employed they share in the service. In thi country the proportion is much smaller—not over one-tent in the cities—and the consequence is a distinct loss in th integrity and the Christian influence of the family in th community. The Christian Endeavor Society proposes "Home Circle of Christian Endeavor," composed of familie enrolled with a simple pledge to maintain family worship i the home.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Successful Hostess

ONE of the most distinctive charms of the successful hostess, is her gracious and cordial manner of welcoming her guests. The instant she meets them, they are aware that their coming has brought her pleasure; that nothing could give her at the moment so much satisfaction as their appearance at her door. "It does me good to hear the sound of your voice in this house," said a winsome and amiable woman one rainy day last spring, as she came hastily down stairs to clasp the hand of her expected visitor. There are shy people, and undemonstrative people, who feel glad when friends come to see them, but who have no art of showing this gladness. They should resolutely conquer their diffidence, and learn how to manifest pleasure in look and word when meeting their guests, for the initiative is always with the hostess. It is for her to be expansive in greeting, and to accord to those who cross her threshold, the freedom of her roof.

When one has invited a relative or an old schoolmate, or a distinguished stranger, or a group of friends, perhaps, to make a visit at her home, if she is an up-to-date person, she has indicated the length of the visit she hopes for. "Come on Friday and stay until Tuesday," or, "I hope you can give me the delight of a glimpse of you next week. Come on Monday afternoon and stay until Wednesday;" adding, if you choose, "and as much longer as you conveniently can." When no time is mentioned, the visit may, without impropriety, extend over a week, but unless very much urged to remain, the guest should leave at the end of that time. The hostess should so arrange her affairs that she may be at liberty to enjoy her friends society while they may stay with her. Autumnal house-cleaning, or a campaign of sewing with a dressmaker in the house, are out of the question when one has guests. Before the guests come, make the house beautifully clean, but let the regular sweeping go undone during their stay, unless, indeed, you can have it done while guests are outdoors or in bed. A certain atmosphere of festivity should pervade a home when friends are in it for pleasuring, and the hostess can hardly give this, unless she plans for it beforehand and has nothing very strenuous on her mind.

In arranging a guest chamber the comfort of guests should be studied. The bed should be soft and the springs in order, towels should be freshly laundered and often the supply should be renewed. Elaborate furnishing is less necessary than the real conveniences which make a guest feel at home. The most successful hostess I know, has, in her beautiful guest chamber, a desk supplied with stationery, pens, ink, and postage stamps; a shelf containing not only devotional books, but one or two interesting new stories, and usually a magazine of the month; slumber shoes, a hot water bag, and a loose dressing sacque; in fact, everything the most exacting guest will probably want. A candle and matches on a stand should be provided, of course, for electric lights may give out, and they are not found in all houses; lamps are troublesome to light, and gas is seldom near the bedside.

A lady, not particularly fond of luxury, said lately, "One thing I do enjoy, and that is, having my bed turned down for me at night." A spare bed often has a very sumptuous spread, it may be lace over silk, it may be only a very dainty white counterpane, but it is to be taken off at night, folded with care and laid aside. Unless the guest is a young girl, and the hostess an elderly woman, in other words, in ordinary circumstances, the hostess is the one to attend to this. The lingery of the guest chamber should not be a burden to the guest.

The ideal hostess will never do, as an excellent woman whom I knew once did, under pressure of shall we say—vanity or snobbishness? She was one of a number of hospitably inclined ladies who had agreed to entertain Synod over one of its annual conventions. A minister was assigned to her care. He arrived, after a long journey—a plain man from the backwoods, with clothing of unfashionable cut and a carpet bag of old-fashioned style in his hand. My lady welcomed him politely but without enthusiasm, and installed him in her least attractive room—a bare prophet's chamber, with the traditional furniture of the Shunamite's choosing—a bed and a table, a stool and a candlestick. The minister saw nothing of which to complain, slept well in the room, prayed in it with great earnestness, came from it with rapt face in the morning and went to Synod. His hostess went, too, and discovered presently, that the man from the remote forests was a man of power, looked up to by his brethren, an orator, a leader, one of the great men of the church. Rushing home, she changed her guest's room, brought him downstairs to a fair, large Chamber of Peace, richly dight, and treated him as if he had been a prince whose incognito she had discovered. Here was her error. Having given him second-best, she had no privilege left her of pulling him out and pushing him into the higher place. If the incident has a moral, it is this:

When you entertain the Lord's avowed workmen, don't give them less attention than you would their Master, if he honored you with his presence visible and beautiful in your earthly home.

WHEN GRAPES ARE RIPE

The purple grapes are ripe and sweet, the clusters hold the summer's sun.
The garnered wealth is now complete, and summer's royal course is run.

A Word in Season

THE young woman behind the counter was pretty and so she had regrets. For she was poor in purse and wanted to finish her schooling and go forward. But fate acted, she had worked so many hours at home that she was tired and true to the big department store, and they found reasons to set her down with her feet. But one evening she wanted to see and to buy were on the other counter, the salesperson and the latter gladly starting with a friend gave her customers the most particular attention.

"She gave him the 'I'll ring,'" said the saleswoman, tossing her head. "Well, I hope Dave will give her a good one. Poor Tom, he's well out of it, I say.

"Dave hasn't given her a ring yet," corrected the other. "He's just his jolly and easy boy ways."

"Did he hesitate," suggested a third young miss, as "the old woman" paid at the big desk for her purchases, before their indignation over past events. "Did he lose his job because he did not ask formally consent for engagement? Because that is what you are doing, my dears, and you," she turned to the friend, "are encouraging her. I don't want to be disagreeable but I must be waited on at once, or I must ask for some one else to come to this counter and attend to me."

The friend walked away like a scolded child in a thaw. The clerk, hugging papers, and looking, maybe the salesman ought to be reported, assented, and this customer turned to go. But as she turned, a kind thought came over her, and she paused to say, "I suppose when I was as young as you, my child, I may have been just as thoughtless, but the people who get on in the world attend to whatever is their first duty, and they don't waste time in idle gossip. Good-bye."

Her smile was so genuine that the girl looked after her without resenting the plain speech. As the old man left the store, a gentleman stepped up to greet her with marked courtesy.

"Who is she?" the saleswoman inquired of another clerk.

"That lady? Oh, she's some one famous or somebody to the front of the time. She's rich, and generally dresses in her carriage, but she does a good deal of work among the poor, and such things she wears. She's been shopping to-day. I s'pose, for she looked tired."

"And I made her more tired. Well, she taught me a lesson. How strange I never saw it before. My time isn't mine to fool with my friends about outside things or busy things. It's Father and Mother time, and their customer's time, and I've got to put in to good account, if I'm an honest girl. Well, I'll try."

Sanitary House-Cleaning

One of the necessary autumn tasks that cannot be slighted or connected with the others. A fastidious and thorough housekeeper may neglect a bed or a carpet, and she is grieved to see that no decaying vegetables and no accumulation of that rubbish is ever thrown down to the sun of the ways, and that no compromise for weather, for cold, for many different articles that is stored in quantity are all things that no mother. One of the most sanitary measures she may take when the sweeping and cleaning and putting up things have been done, or as soon as the whole ordinary routine and entire cleaning is over and season and dallying with gusts to find a sickening gust, and it is objected. Then the cellar floors as it should be, and the various closets, and the attic and all garments may be inspected. Wholesome housekeeping is satisfied with nothing but rigid cleansing.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS,"

CHAPTER VI

"WOULD you be willing, Quits, to go over to the Sentinel office and——"

Douglas paused as Quits stopped working and looked curiously at him. George was listening, an incredulous stare on his inky countenance, which at any other time would have made Douglas laugh.

"And show them what is the matter—to—to—put the machines into working order?"

"I'm perfectly willing, Mr. Douglas," Quits replied and there was a light on his homely face that quite transfigured it.

"I don't feel just right——," Douglas began, then stopped, wondering if Quits understood.

"I see," said Quits, as he reached up after his coat and hat. "You don't want to come down to the Mayor's level by hating him the way he hates you."

"That's a part of it. How did you know?" Douglas asked, startled at Quits' knowledge of the case.

"I've been there," Quits said briefly.

"My mother taught me," Douglas said as Quits put on his coat, "that it never did any good to hate anybody, and I've been hating the Mayor good and hard for some time. I can't do my work right if I keep this up. I've got to learn to love him. This seems like a good chance to heap coals of fire on his head."

"I'd sooner fire a pailful of slugs at him," muttered George, the edge of whose conscience was not quite sharpened up to the extent of loving the Mayor or Coleman.

"Shall I say anything to the Mayor, Mr. Douglas, for you?" Quits paused in the door a moment.

"Simply tell him that I have asked you to help put the machines in order, and that he is welcome to your services this evening."

Quits went out and Douglas began to write. He had never felt more at peace with God and men. He did not realize himself, but in that dingy little room in that little country town had been fought out a tremendous battle against the world old barbarism of hate, and the spirit of the Peasant of Galilee had come off conqueror. The savage primitive man who is still found in all our breasts had been compelled to get down off the throne for another time, and in his place sat a figure wearing the crown of thorns, with the love look of the cross in his patient eyes. When George came up to the desk a few minutes after Quits had gone out, and asked Douglas for something, the boy was not so dull, that even he, could detect the presence of the transforming life, and he silently went back to his work, leaving Douglas to continue his writing unmolested by any criticism or remark.

When Quits entered the Sentinel office, he found the entire office force, including the Mayor, anxiously gathered about the machines. Coleman was on his knees, a scowl on his sallow face, and a litter of bolts, nuts and screws on the floor beside him. The rest of the office force stood around trying to assist Mr. Coleman with more or less silent and outspoken profanity.

Quits went up to the edge of the circle, and, for a moment, his entrance was not noticed, on account of the absorbed interest every one was taking in Coleman's efforts to find the difficulty. Just as Quits came into the circle, Coleman got up off his knees and threw down a wrench with an oath.

"The old machine can go to Jericho for all of me! I can't fix it."

He looked around the circle of anxious faces and caught Quits' grave, homely countenance among them. Quits nodded, and in the silence that followed Coleman's outburst he said slowly:

"Mr. Bartlett, I think I can fix the machines all right. Mr. Douglas sent me over to offer my services."

"What! Mr. Douglas sent you over here!"

"He'll fix the machines all right if you give him a show at them," Coleman said savagely.

Bartlett stepped up to Quits.

"What do you know about the Hattersley?" he asked sharply.

"I've helped to make them in the factory," Quits replied quickly.

"Don't let him touch them, Mr. Bartlett. He'll ruin them," Coleman said with a snarl.

"I couldn't ruin them for use any more than they are now if I tried," said Quits simply. "If you are willing to give me a chance, Mr. Bartlett, I believe I can straighten them out. Mr. Douglas heard of your difficulty and sent me over here to help you. That's all there is to it. He said I might stay all the evening if it was necessary. But I don't think it will."

There was an expressive silence in the Sentinel press-room. It was broken by the mayor saying sullenly, "I don't care who puts the machines in order. If you can do it, I'll pay you a good stiff price. There are advertising contracts beginning with this week's issue that I can't afford——"

But Quits was already on his knees looking over the assortment of metal pieces which Coleman had distributed over the floor.

"The trouble is with the bell cranks," he said, after a keen investigation. "You can't depress the pistons with the bell cranks in that position."

He rapidly replaced the parts that had been separated from the machine, and after some two hours experimenting, the machine was working perfectly. Leaving the operator at work on it, Quits went over to the other machine, and found that the propeller which drew the rows of type forward to the pistons worked by the bell cranks, had been thrown out of gear by imperfect bands of rubber. The difficulty was more serious than in the case of the other machine, but he finally mastered it, and when he rose to go at midnight, the machine was in perfect working order.

Quits was going out in his silent fashion when the Mayor abruptly drew him into his office.

"Here's your pay," he said, roughly, handing out to Quits a fifty-dollar bill.

Quits shook his head and did not take the money. "I am not authorized to take any thing, Mr. Bartlett. You are welcome to my services."

"I don't want your services without paying for them."

"I shall not take your money. It's Mr. Douglas' affair. I am working for him."

"I'll send the money to him, then. I don't care to be under any obligation to him," said the Mayor, with a scowl.

Quits smiled gravely. "I don't think he'll take the money, either, Mr. Bartlett. Do you know why Mr. Douglas sent me over here to-night?"

The Mayor was silent a moment. But his curiosity finally got the better of his sullen feeling.

"No I don't. Why did he?"

"He was afraid of getting to hate you if he kept on," replied Quits with perfe simplicity.

The Mayor stared at Quits, but did n utter a word, and in the silence followi his remark, Quits went out.

He found Douglas and George still the Beacon office, and in his brief fashi related the experience of the evening.

"I knew you didn't want me to take t money, Mr. Douglas."

"And yet," muttered George, "we ne an office towel the worst kind. I'd li to see anybody offer me fifty dollars a expect me to make 'em a Christmas pr ent of it. But I bet that old Colema punching himself to think he hadn't g sense enough to adjust a bell crank on Hattersley. Did he give you a fr ticket to the opery when you got through

"No, he didn't," said Quits gravel "What do I want of a ticket to the oper I never go."

"You did all right about the money Douglas said. "Well, it's a good ev ning's work. If Rice & Co. would se us some paper now, we wouldn't refu that. But it's too much to expect." H sighed as he went back to his desk, faci again the discouragement of a falling su scription list, the failure of Rice & Co. make good their contract, and the know edge that Esther's generous sharing wi him was only a brief respite from ultima suspension of the paper.

In spite of all forebodings, however, l slept well that night, and thanked G when he awoke that, so far as he kne he hated no man in the wide world.

That forenoon a messenger broug him a brief note from the Sentinel offic enclosing a check for fifty dollars for se vice rendered. Douglas asked the me senger to wait, and returned the che with a brief word of acknowledgment f the courtesy, but declining to accept pa for service that had simply been offere in a spirit of friendliness.

This note had no reply, but late th afternoon Douglas received a telegra from Clinton.

"Paper on hand. Will ship at once.

RICE & CO."

He took the telegram over to Quits.

"The Mayor is getting even," was a he said.

"No man is all bad all over, all t time," Douglas said thoughtfully.

"We are apt to think other men are little worse than we are," Quits said. "C course we don't expect the Sentinel change its politics or fight the Beac any less after this, but I guess the Ma or's got a streak of fat in him along wi the lean."

"Like most hogs," said George.

"I didn't say that," Quits protested.

"I know you didn't, I said it for yo If I didn't say things for you and M Douglas, lots of things that need to b said would never be said."

Quits pondered on this while Dougl ran out to tell Mr. Edwards the new about the paper.

He found Mr. Vernon there, earnest talking with Mr. Edwards.

"The crisis is bound to come," t minister was saying. "The politicia can't stop it. It will not be ten years b fore the Legislature will have to subm the question to the people. The fight centering more and more for represent tives on the issue. The sentiment growing, and the Mayor and all his tri cannot stop it."

Douglas forgot about his own matte in the spirited talk that followed, for M Edwards was simply a crank, as he hi self said, when it came to temperanc and he would pound on the counter wi the scale weights to emphasize his asse tions, and Douglas remembers seei

IN THE KINGDOM OF LITTLE THINGS"

What the Order of the King's Daughters has Accomplished Since it was Founded

By MARY LOWE DICKINSON

RY LOWE DICKINSON

N Detroit, Michigan, the International Order of the King's Daughters and Sons, lately closed a remarkable conference, at which were present several members of the Central Council, the Dominion Secretary of Canada and the Provincial Secretary of Ontario, and representatives from many States of the union, including the State officers and official represen-ves from Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Illinois, sissippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, North and th Carolina, Maryland, Pennsylvania, ssachusetts, Rhode Island and New York. t was an unusual gathering of able and of nest women which for three days gave it- up to the discussion of the work of the ler in all its phases, and to the comparison deas as to the best methods of developing improving their work in its methods and uence.

Mrs. Bottome was there with her words of piration. Mrs. Davis took in the Confer- e on her way back from conventions at xas and other points in the South. The siding officer of the Conference was Mrs. W. Jefferson of Kentucky; Secretary, Mrs. ry Thomson Howe, a daughter of the late hop Thomson of Mississippi. Thanks gely to Mrs. Bernard Whitney, Chairman the City Union of Detroit, who had charge the local arrangements, the intervals of nference sessions were filled with social en- tainment, — receptions, lunches, dinners, es, to which was added a charming excur- n on the water, for which half a dozen am yachts were put at the disposal of the embly.

HEN the Order was founded, women generally were entering upon a new of sympathy and co-operation. The demic of organization, breaking out con- ntly in new societies, had not yet reached height; but its tendencies emphasized the cessity of having something to organize. e whole underlying principle, object and son for existence of the Order lie in the t that its leaders believed it possible to cure such beautiful things to love and con- t and helpfulness from their buried places words and books, and put them into act- l practice in every-day life. They realized w largely every existence is made up of le things, and they began a sort of crusade capture life's little things and make them ents for good. They said, "Everything, wever small, that makes a human being tter or happier is proper work for the chil- en of the King."

The Order was from the beginning, and s continued to be, a religious society. It w that Christ while here gave himself up to ing good. It believed there was unfinish- good to be accomplished by those who imed to have his spirit of good will to men, d it called the Order, through each one of members, to do its little share of that un- ished work. Hence it chose for its watch- ord "In His Name," and every member as bound to do that which, under the same rcumstances, he or she believed the Master mself would do.

T was the wish of the ten women who form- ed the original Circle to start a quiet ork, moving from heart to heart, influenc- g the character and the life, developing piritual vitality in the soul, and stimulating le Christian activities of the hands. Not- ithstanding their early efforts to avoid pub- city, the idea was seized upon quite gener- ly, and the growth of the Order was even o rapid for its greatest good. The disad- ntages of abnormal increase have been rgely overcome by the help of systematic rganization. So great was the call for for- gn organization that the name was le- ally changed to the International Order, nd it counts its members in England, ermany, France, Australia, New Zealand, nd on nearly every mission-field around he world.

One principle of the Order, from the be- inning, has been entire freedom with refer- nce to the choice of a line of work. There s no escape from the obligation to serve. The embers must absolutely be of use, and must o something that is helpful to someone other han themselves. This freedom in choice of ork is based on the idea that great forces re wasted by people who undertake work or which they are in no way adapted. The rder is intended to be educational in this articular. Each little group of workers ust get its eyes open and look about to find he thing nearest to it that most needs to be one, and then see if it is possible to bring its forces to bear upon that particular need. Its kingdom is the kingdom of little things.

ALL over our country we know of multitudes of homes where the spirit of kindness and helpfulness has taken the place of the spirit of fault finding and discontent; homes where the young girls have learned not to let the mother do all the hard work and wear all the old clothes, while they have the pretty things and the easy times; homes in which the boys have learned that courtesy and helpfulness are among the first requisites of the Son of the King.

In one little neighborhood there grew up a Circle composed entirely of mothers-in-law, who discovered that the application of the principle of good-will and loving-kindness made living tolerable even with the women who married their sons. Circles of aged women and of invalid women, who had come to feel that life was sorrowful to them because they were no longer of use to other people, have united and found their failing powers revived, and astonished themselves and their neighbors by the amount of good they have been able to accomplish. One old lady of eighty has made with her own hands the quilts for sixty of the little beds in an orphan asylum.

AWAY out on the Western prairies, in Nebraska and Dakota, neighbors come together from distances of ten to twenty miles, and the monthly meeting becomes a sewing-bee in which all take hold of the mending and the making for the household where they meet. Busy little bands in some places have not only nursed sick strangers through illness, but purchased a strangers' lot in the cemetery, and in one instance, at least, have supplied their town with a hearse, where an express wagon had formerly been used to carry the dead to the grave. Up in Canada, a Circle of bright girls worked to secure money enough to dig a cellar under their church, and then went at it again and earned the money to buy the furnace, by which the shivering worshipers could be kept warm through the winter service of their chilly clime.

I could fill this entire article with stories of the beautiful things done by little children alone, and by mothers who have lost their own little ones and given their hearts and minds to the care of children who, in the truest sense, had never known real "mothering" before. I remember one instance of a little lad of twelve years, whose father, in passing through a strange city, was invited to attend a banquet of business men. Not liking to leave his son alone at the hotel he took him to the banquet, and at the table when the wine was poured, the child touched the little silver cross fastened to his watch-chain and said gently to the waiter, "I don't take any wine, neither does papa. I wear this little silver cross."

That little cross his mother showed me, saying, in a voice choked with tears, "I took it from his breast when he lay in his coffin, and put another in its place. He could not do great things: he did many lovely little things, and I know that in this one instance his loyalty to his little cross caused many a glass to be pushed aside untouched."

Another little fellow of four years, whenever his naughty temper got the better of him, ran to his mother pulling at his little badge with, "Take it off quick, mamma; take it off, I am bad. Take it off till I'm a good boy," and it is his mother's testimony that it has been a strong influence in his little life. A dear little girl, who liked better to play than to help her mother, when asked what she had done, replied: "Monday I minded the baby and setted the table, and Tuesday I minded the baby and unsetted the table"; both the setting and the unsetting were a trial to the precious little soul.

BUT these little odd and irregular things, accounts of which might be multiplied indefinitely, are only a drop in the stream of service that has flowed steadily through regular channels. Space will not allow me to give even a hint of the number of kindergartens, kitchen gardens, Sunday Schools, dispensaries, and day nurseries, now established where none existed before. There are numerous new missions in operation, there are many students being educated for one field or another of work. Libraries have been formed, and thousands of books and periodicals distributed. Innumerable bouquets of flowers now gladden the sick in hospitals in almost every city in the land, and a great many churches are in better condition, spiritually and financially, than they were before the members entered upon their work. Indeed, in many church societies the entire membership is divided up into little Circles and Committees, the work of one Circle being to welcome strangers; of another, to look after the sick, to make the poor feel comfortable and at home; of another, to build up the Sunday School.

One pastor told me that he had worked hard for four years to get the women of his church to help in its work, but after the Order found its way there he had hard work to find work enough to keep them busy. The pastor of a large city church gives this testimony: "As a pastor, I depend almost entirely on these Circles. I have been relieved from a vast amount of calling and labor. I am like one sitting at a retail machine. Whenever relief is needed, I have but to touch the key of that machine, and I know the matter will be attended to. I have got into the habit of turning immediately to these Circles when I am called upon for help. I do not know what I would do without them. I have eleven or twelve Circles in the church with a membership of one hundred and fifty people. We meet every quarter in a Chapter meeting, and give information to one another as to what we are doing, and then some good speaker contributes inspiration, and we go on again to the work of the Master, doing with our might what our hands find to do."

THE interdenominational character of the Order has resulted in many Circles composed of members of different churches, and has made Circles from various denominations ready and willing to come together in some united work—missionary, educational or philanthropic. The attitude of the Order toward the church, and the spirit it seeks to inculcate in its members, are illustrated by this little story, which came under my personal knowledge.

In a large city church there was a flourishing Circle of the King's Sons. It was a Methodist Church, and a new pastor, finding this Circle there, objected strongly to its continuance, and felt it should be turned into an Epworth League society. The young men did not want to give up their Circle, and sought advice of a leading officer of the Order. They were reminded that the Order taught that its members should never hinder, but always help their own church. They were asked to pray for guidance as to which was their greater duty—to the Order or to their church. The young men, after meeting twice for prayer, came to the conclusion that they would be most loyal to the Order by being loyal to their church, and they went to the pastor, telling him they were willing now to give up the Circle. When the pastor had heard their story, however, he shook hands heartily all around, and said that he should not let them do anything of the sort.

The Order has also a system of Chapters, fifty persons in any one line of work forming a chapter in that work. Hence we see records of Hospital Chapters and Chapters for work among the Indians, and Chapters for tenement-house work, etc.

IT will easily be seen from the above that the object of the Order has not been to create new societies, but to interest and educate new workers in whatever good work is most in need of help. The Order furnished notable instances of doing good, separated from the dreary dolefulness that so often is associated—especially in the minds of the young—with helpful work. Its young people not only do beautiful things, but many of them write that they find the doing "needs of fun." One circle of bright girls, desiring to raise $150 to help their church, became makers of cake, and they frollicked their way through many difficulties, not only with the best spirit of love and good-will, but also in the jolliest of moods. They "rustled" about among their friends to secure orders for fruit cake. They got so many orders that they had to buy a wash-tub to mix in. They took a room, which they called their "bakery" and pressed into the service a white horse, which they called the "missionary pony." They made a little party and invited the ladies who were to buy their cake to make them a visit, and then set these ladies to stoning the raisins. When the wash-tub was well filled with the fruity compound, and their young gentlemen friends inhaling the fragrance of good things, put their heads in at the door, they were invited to come right in and take a stir at the tub. When the "missionary pony" failed them, and the small legs of the boy who was hired to distribute the cake gave out, the girls loaded it into wheelbarrows and after dark trundled it about the town themselves. They got their money, they helped the church, and they had their fun. And this is only one of innumerable instances in which their cheerful and common sense methods have really brought beautiful things to pass.

The Order has been loyal to its purpose to improve individual character, to develop a higher type of spiritual life, and has given little time or strength to the increase of its numbers or the enlargement of its organization. Yet notwithstanding its failure to avail itself of the ordinary methods of growth, its progress has been of a marked and influential character, and the Order may fairly be counted among the most helpful regenerative influences of our day.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

D. J. C., Woodstock, N. Y. 1. Who was the original author of the following quotation: "Millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute?" And in connection with what circumstances in the past history of our country was it first used? 2. Did it relate to any treaty with the Barbary States?

The words are said to have been uttered by Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, of South Carolina, a brave soldier of the Revolution, and for some time aide-de-camp to General Washington. He was a joint commissioner to France with Elbridge Gerry and John Marshall, to adjust the difficulties arising from the arrogant attitude of the French republican rulers toward the United States. Talleyrand, in behalf of the French Directory, intimated that an enormous bribe for the members of the Directory was a necessary preliminary to negotiations, and that otherwise war might ensue. Pinckney replied, "War be it then, sir; millions for defence, but not one cent for tribute." A naval war with France followed, in which the French were repeatedly defeated, and they were glad at length to seek peace with the United States.

H. G. D., Loyalville, Pa. 1. Is it a sin to have a temperance lecture, with pictures to illustrate, in a church on a week-day evening, and charge ten cents admittance? 2. Is it a sin to collect money on Sunday to pay church expenses?

No, to both questions. A good temperance lecture at ten cents admission, ought to be well worth the money, and it certainly is not out of place in church, week days. As to the second matter, church expenses must be met. They are a legitimate charge, and if it be desired to avoid bringing them up on Sundays, the congregation should pay them voluntarily during the week.

G. M. P., Ontario. Is the utterance of a wicked thought, at the suggestion of the tempter, a sin that will not be forgiven? The warning in Heb. 12: 16, 17, appears to imply this.

We are not responsible for our temptations, but for yielding to and encouraging them. The sin consists in acquiescence. Christ himself was tempted. God tempts no man, but the evil spirit in our own hearts tempts us. If you will ask God, in Christ's name, to free you from these temptations and to purify your mind and heart, the temptations will have no power over you. They will come again and again, but will retire baffled and defeated. It is the only way. Christ's prayer (taught to his disciples), is, "Abandon us not in temptation" (the power of the tempter), and not "remove us from temptation." It is a part of our earthly discipline. The passage relating to Esau (Heb. 12: 16, 17), which you quote, has no reference to a case like yours. His was a wilful and deliberate act, not a momentary thought. Many persons have suffered needlessly as you are doing. Be you sure of this: the truly repentant soul is never rejected of God. He repeatedly assures us that he is more ready to grant pardon than we are to ask it.

Mrs. B. R. N., Suspension, Ala. 1. What is the "triple crown" worn by the Pope, and why is it so called? 2. Is Sing Sing a State prison or United States prison?

1. The triple crown is really a tiara or bishop's council-cap with three coronets, one rising above another and adorned with jewels. The tiara was first used at the coronation of Pope Nicholas II. in 858 A.D. Although the third crown was not added until the Papacy of Urban V., 1362-1370. The Pope wears it only on the occasion of great ecclesiastical festivities and processions, but not at the ordinary functions of the Vatican. 2. It is a State, and not a Federal prison.

Subscriber, Inlet, Hamilton Co., N. Y. Will you kindly give through your columns the principles of the wireless telegraphy, especially the key for receiving the messages?

We have submitted this inquiry to the editor of The Electrical World, New York City, who kindly replies as follows: "It is, of course, impossible to condense in a paragraph the principles of wireless telegraphy, the book literature on the subject indicating the compass required for such an explanation. Briefly, by means of a transmitter, etheric vibrations are set up which are propagated through the ether and affect the coherer at the receiving end. The receiver consists of an induction of spark coil, the electric discharges between the electrodes setting up the necessary disturbance in the ether. The main part of the receiver, namely, the coherer, has normally a high resistance, but when subjected to etheric waves, assumes a low resistance. In circuit with the coherer is a battery and Morse recorder or sounder. Normally, the resistance of the coherer is too great to allow the passage of an appreciable current from the battery; under the influence of the waves propagated from the transmitter, however, the resistance of the coherer is reduced, a current passes from the battery through the circuit and operates the receiving instrument. The discharges at the transmitter are controlled by a form of the ordinary telegraph key; and the messages are received, as stated above, by a form of the ordinary Morse recorder or sounder. There are many details connected both with the transmitter and receiver of which a knowledge is necessary for a full understanding of wireless telegraphy, but the inquirer can learn of these from a book on the subject. W. D. WEAVER."

W. McD., Piedmont, Ala. Is a person ever justified in telling a falsehood? The question was brought in our Sunday School class yesterday, studying about Jonathan telling a falsehood to his father with reference to David's whereabouts?

This subject has already been thoroughly discussed by the readers of this journal in a general symposium. The conclusion is that from the Christian standpoint, a falsehood can never be justifiable and is unnecessary; that faith in God will strengthen us to tell the truth at all times, leaving all consequences with him, and that the lack of that faith will dispose us to the subterfuge of falsehood. From the standpoint of worldly wisdom, a falsehood may be regarded as justifiable; but God is truth, and whosoever trusts in him can make no compromise with falsehood.

Mrs. W. N. D., Terre-Haut, Ind. 1. Among the annual appropriations by Congress you will find the Post-office expenditures included. 2. Melchizedek, King of Salem. has always been a subject of discussion to Biblical scholars and commentators. Some have held that

An Interesting Question for All

An aged friend of this journal sends us this question, which we submit to our readers:

I am now considerably over sixty, and I wish my earthly affairs to be settled up. It is my desire to dispose of FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS in such a way that the very best use may be made of it now and hereafter, for the advancement of Christ's kingdom and the good of my fellow-beings. What do you advise?

Instead of counseling the writer to select any particular missionary, benevolent, philanthropic or other good work as the object of his generosity, we prefer that he should have the benefit of the combined advice of our CHRISTIAN HERALD Family of readers, most of whom are already familiar, through these pages, with many good works now going on in different parts of the world. We, therefore, invite all of our readers to answer, stating what course, in their best judgment, the inquirer should follow to make his gift most effective. In naming their choice of objects—whether they select Home or Foreign Missions, Rescue Work (among men or women), Gospel Missions, Orphanages, Work among the Tenement Waifs, etc., etc.,—let each state the reason for such a selection and the advantages it affords. Answers should not exceed one hundred words. Every letter should be addressed to he was a Divine incarnation, others that he was a righteous priest-king who had sprung from obscure or unknown parentage (this being regarded by many as the interpretation of the phrase in Hebrews 7:3). He is held by orthodox Christians as a mysterious type of the great High Priest, Christ Jesus. Scores of books and treatises have been written concerning him, but his origin and personality are still clouded in mystery.

H. S., Hickman, Neb. 1. What relation are the children of two families to each other where the mothers are first cousins? 2. Are such children too closely related to get married to each other?

1. They are second cousins. 2. Marriages between second cousins, though not advisable on the ground of consanguinity, are not infrequent, and are nowhere prohibited.

C. A. R., La Porte City, Ia., writes:

E. S. D. asks: "Can you give me the author, and where I may find the following quotation: 'My friend has refused to his enemies all I remain to bury up the embers, and then to follow'?" I think E. S. D. must refer to Longfellow's poem, "Three Friends of Mine." The first of a cluster of poems called "A Book of Sonnets." The last four lines of the fourth verse reads:

Thou hast but taken up thy lamp and gone to bed,
I stay a little longer, as one stays
To cover up the embers that still burn.

J. Milford K., Cortland, N. Y. 1. Apropos of the great comet, if it obeys almost all precedent, it must pass around the sun, unless it should encounter or strike some opaque, heavy body "square between the eyes," which may happen to be in its orbit. In that case it will be estoped and turned back, or out into space. But comets are not erratic "wandering Jews," as many still suppose, for they are legitimate creations of our Heavenly Father, and obey the laws he has established. 2. The CHRISTIAN HERALD asks: "Is there another planet inside the orbit of Mercury?" and Mr. Serviss answers in the negative; I have to say that there is, and I desired I will tell you how, where and when to find. I believe there are a pair of twin worlds there.

Mr. Garrett P. Serviss, the well-known astronomical authority, to whom the question was referred, sends this reply:

Editor the Mail Bag:—As to another planet inside the orbit of Mercury I can only repeat what I have said before, that all efforts of astronomers to discover it have been unavailing. In 1878, during an eclipse, two American astronomers believed they had seen two small planets nearer the sun than Mercury; but subsequent investigation has shown that they mistook stars for planets. If Mr. K. can demonstrate the existence of "a pair of twin worlds" inside the orbit of Mercury, or anywhere else where astronomers have not yet discovered them, he will cover himself with glory. As to comets, no astronomer ever supposed they were not obedient to physical laws. They no more wander at random than do the planets. But the great eccentricity of their orbits, and their liability to perturbation from the attraction of the planets near which they pass, cause them to appear very erratic when compared with the steady-going members of the sun's planetary family.

GARRETT P. SERVISS.

H. L. Milford, Pa. Is a pastor authorized to shorten the time of the services held in church?

We believe it is within the discretion of the pastor to do so whenever necessary. Extreme heat, a violent storm, or some other cause may arise to make it advisable. Under normal conditions, however, there can be no good excuse for shortening the period of service.

D. S. B., Nehalen, Oregon, writes:

An item in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recalls to my mind the following: During February, 1855 (or near that date), Sylvester Merrills, of Belleville, Ill., sold a yoke of oxen to a man by the name of Mitchell, who at once moved with the oxen to Arkansas. One morning the following June, Mr. Merrills' son, Frederick, found the same oxen standing at the farm yard gate of his father, they having returned to their home in Illinois. A letter of inquiry revealed the fact that, after putting in his spring crop, Mr. Mitchell had turned the oxen out to graze on the Arkansas prairie, and they returned to their old home in Illinois, evidently having swam the Mississippi River. Mr. Merrills returned the purchase price of the steers to Mr. Mitchell and allowed the oxen to spend the remainder of their days at their old home in Illinois.

Reader. Are tea, coffee and chocolate stimulants, and if so is it any harm to use or sell them?

All these are stimulants, yet, used in moderation, they cannot be classed as harmful, but rather as beneficial. Coffee and chocolate contain a certain amount of nutriment which entitle them to be regarded as foods. Taken in excess any one of the three will prove injurious to the digestion and debilitating to the nerves.

Reader, Teien, Minn. To whom did Thomas, called Didymus, refer in John 11: 16, Christ or Lazarus?

When Thomas said "Let us also go that we may die with him," he evidently referred to Christ. He perceived how the journey to Judea would end, and how full of peril it was to the Master, and fearless with the utmost devotion, felt that it became worthy of record to the fury of his enemies, they would not care to survive him.

The Gospel for the Immigrants

The immigration question is a problem for the church as well as for the nation. Presbyterians are taking hold of it aggressively. The late General Assembly instructed its Boards of Home Missions and Sabbath School Work to proceed actively to an extension of their work among our foreign speaking population. The latter Board is taking advantage of "Rally Day" to bring the matter before all Presbyterian Sunday Schools. The schools will be asked to provide $25,000 for the sending of a number of colporteurs to the parts of the country largely occupied by foreign-speaking population. These men, as the representatives of the Presbyterian children, will distribute Bibles and other literature in the tongues of the people visited. The undertaking is one of patriotism as well as of religion, and is especially calculated to enlist the sympathy of the young people.

Cocoa Tea Cakes

CORN STARCH TALK

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

A child's craving for sweets is a very natural one, and should be gratified, but in a rational manner. When a child is allowed free access to the cake box or doughnut jar he is often tempted to eat when he would be much better off without food, so it is well to restrict the use of sweets to a legitimate place, as a dessert to the regular meal. Much meat is not a suitable diet for children, but starch and fats are very needful.

The fat of cream and good butter is easily assimilated and more digestible than the fat of meats. To furnish starch we have many food products to choose from, and sugar in various forms plays an important part. For pure starch we have nothing to compare with Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, and it may be used in some dish daily without monotony. It is capable of infinite variety in preparation, and is both inexpensive and easy to use.

A simple cake that will please almost any child is one in which cocoa and Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch form a part. The receipt given makes a simple and attractive cake which will give no one a pang of regret for the eating.

COCOA TEA CAKES.

Beat singly three large eggs into a scant cup of sugar creamed with a third of a cup of butter. When smooth and light add half a cup of milk and half a cup each of flour and Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch sifted with three level teaspoons of baking powder and one-fourth cup of cocoa. Beat well, add a little salt and half a teaspoon of vanilla. Place in muffin pans, sprinkle with chopped nuts and bake in moderate oven.

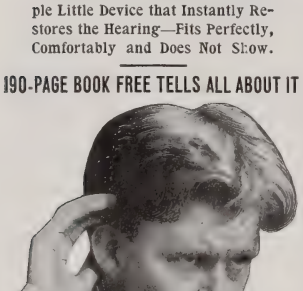
Deafness Overcome

Louisville Man Originates a Simple Little Device that Instantly Restores the Hearing—Fits Perfectly, Comfortably and Does Not Show.

190-PAGE BOOK FREE TELLS ALL ABOUT IT



Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any such old-fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf, and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is effective even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and, aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness in any person no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bonafide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station in life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.,—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device; you will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address for the free book and convincing evidence, Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1032 Todd building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

him once, in the enthusiasm of a remark, pick up a dozen eggs in a paper bag that a clerk had carelessly left within reach of Edwards' gesticulating arms and throw the entire bag full on the counter, spattering his astonished hearers with a liberal raw omelet, and convincing them of his earnestness in not winning them over to his views with his arguments.

"Don't forget about Sage's temperance picnic, Mr. Vernon," Douglas called out, as the minister was leaving.

"No, indeed; that's a capital idea. That will create sentiment among the coming voters and legislators."

"Heard about that temperance story Miss Harris and Douglas are going to write?" Edwards asked. "It's my opinion though, that if they get their heads together there'll be precious little progress on any story except their own."

"I am looking forward to that, Douglas," the minister smiled. "Mr. Sage mentioned it as a possibility. Success to you both."

"Thank you," Douglas laughed. "Mr. Edwards hasn't much faith in my part of it. To tell the truth, I haven't much for myself, but I'm going to try."

When spring arrived Esther had completed her chapter, and one evening she read it to Douglas and Mr. and Mrs. Edwards. The next evening Douglas took the chapter down to the Beacon office, and when Quits and George had gone out, he shut the door, locked it, and read the chapter through.

During the winter months that preceded this time, the Beacon had struggled along with a variety of experiences. There had been times when if it had not been for Esther's cheerful faith and buoyant temper Douglas might have been tempted to give up the fight. Many of his trials he never told her or any one but fought them out alone. Some of them Esther and Edwards guessed, and their combined encouragement meant everything to the young editor. Esther insisted on helping again with a little money, which Douglas accepted, on condition that when they were married he would repay with interest. Mr. Edwards also once made Douglas accept an unusually large advertisement, and paid for it in advance, at a time when the treasury was so low in the Beacon office, that Douglas did not know where another dollar could possibly be found to keep up running expenses.

Then to his surprise, Mr. Vernon had helped increase his subscription list by interesting his church young people in the paper, and forming a club that worked in connection with a combination magazine offer. This was practical help that brought in some ready cash, and, what was better still, added to the regular constituency of the paper.

The Father of the Faithful*

Lessons from the Character of Abraham Which Apply to Modern Life

VERY difficult it is for people of our day to realize what must have been the situation of Abraham when the call of God came to him in Haran. Already with his father, Terah, he had left the moon-worshipers of Ur of the Chaldees. We may infer from this and later accounts in connection with Jacob's sojourn with Laban, that they were a large company, and that there was a radical difference between Abraham and his brother Nahor and the others. In any case, separation was necessary, and though kindly memories evidently survived between the two branches of the family, that separation was complete. The records of those early times recently discovered and now being deciphered, may give us an idea of a more advanced state of civilization than we gain from the Bible narrative; but whatever it may have been, it must have been no slight test of Abraham's faith to quit his family and relatives and go out into unknown regions. Whether or not the population was large, whether there were organized industries and cultured societies, Abraham would be a stranger, solitary and separate from the tribes of the earth.

That the separation was due to religious reasons is clear. Even then, how we cannot guess, Abraham had learned that there was only one God, had learned to know and listen to his voice, and had the courage to obey it. That is stronger faith than many have now, even with clearer light. The conscience, God's voice in us, often tells us that our duty is some painful separation; we know that we ought at any cost to part company with some one dear to us and live for God only. The same strong faith characterized Abraham all through his life. Indeed, it was his most conspicuous characteristic. What it must have cost him to send away Hagar, to take Isaac to the mountain to kill him, no soul can tell. But the command reaching him found the man true to his ideal. To obey at any cost, to do his duty as he perceived it, however painful it might be, this is a trait of marvelous strength, when we remember how little he could have known of God. An effort has been made by modern sceptics to destroy the personality of the man, and to represent him as a mythical character, or even as a tribe; but such efforts fail, because our own consciousness recognizes the personality in him, and sees in the rare instances of his weakness how human he was, and how typical of our common humanity, was this wonderful man in that far-off time, fighting and overcoming in the struggle in which we are engaged, and by the same means, by which alone we can gain the victory. With us, as with him, the triumph comes by faith.

THE HEAVENLY MESSAGE*

The Duty and Reward of Knowing and Obeying the Word of God

WHAT is the Word of God? The critics have been busy for more than half a century dissecting and analyzing the Bible to discover who wrote it, and when, and in what manner, and by what means it reached its present condition. That their labors have enabled us to get a clearer idea of the Bible, and have removed many difficulties and solved many perplexing problems, cannot be denied, but back of all their work and above all their theories, the sublime truth stands impregnable, that the Bible is a communication from God. That it came to us by human channels was inevitable, otherwise we could not have understood it; but the message by whomsoever delivered is from God.

Lubbock, in his charming book on ants, describes the wonderful industries of those little creatures. He watched their endeavors to surmount various difficulties and the ingenuity with which they overcame obstacles. He marveled that there were some problems that they could not solve. With all their skill in building and tunneling, they do not know how to build a bridge, and consequently a narrow stream of water cuts them off from their home. He laid a straw across such a stream, about two inches wide, and they availed themselves at once of the bridge thus made. Lubbock says he wishes he could have talked to them, but they could not even see him or hear him. The distance between the ant and the man in the scale of creation is infinitely less than the distance between man and his Creator. How then could God communicate with us? He has done it by inspiring men to give us his message, and we have it in the Bible. We know that it is so by experience. We feel its inspiration, we see its effect in our own lives and in the lives of others; we feel its uplifting power.

Having then a Divine message in our hands, what is our duty? In its pages is information we could never have discovered for ourselves; there is counsel which will enable us to regulate our lives. What we shall become if we live according to the rules therein prescribed we cannot imagine, any more than the caterpillar can imagine the life of the butterfly into which it will develop; but we can trust and wait, and in the meantime our heavenly Father's message ought to be our constant and most patient study.

EXACT OBEDIENCE

Error of Doing a Right Thing Wrongly

By Mrs. M. Baxter

DAVID, the man after God's own heart, delighted in worshiping and doing honor to his God. It was a burden to his heart that when Saul persecuted him, he was cut off from "the inheritance of the Lord" (I. Sam. 26: 19); and when he fled from Absalom, his sure hope was that he should again come into the Lord's house, and says, "In thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple" (Ps. 5: 7). The early Psalms, after the first two, are believed to have been written at this period.

It was after David was anointed king over all Israel (II. Sam. 5: 6, 7), that he determined to bring back the Ark of God. He consulted with the captains of thousands and of hundreds, even with every leader. "And David said let us bring again the Ark of our God to us, for we sought not unto it in the days of Saul" (I. Chron. 13: 1-3, R.V.). Saul's reign did not honor God.

To David this was a matter of the utmost importance—it was to be a national act of worship. "And all the assembly said that they would do so: for the thing was right in the eyes of all the people" (13: 4). Thus from the extreme south, the brook of Egypt, to Hamath, in the extreme north, David assembled all the people together. And he went up at the head of all the representatives of Israel to Kirjath-jearim, to bring up from thence the ark of God. David was doing a right thing, but he failed in implicit obedience, and he did a right thing in a wrong way. He had not searched in the Word of God to find out how God would have it done. They carried the ark "on a new cart," just as the Philistines had done when they sent back the ark of God after the destruction of their idol, Dagon, by the presence of God, when the ark had been placed by them in the idol's temple (I. Sam. 5: 7).

David knew God better perhaps than any man of his day with the exception of Samuel; yet he had not fully learned to wait until he knew, not only what he was to do, but when and how it should be done. He knew the law of the Lord, but at this time failed to recognize the importance of exact obedience "They brought up the ark, and David and all Israel played before God with all their might. Every one did his best, but all this did not make up for the want of obedience in what might have seemed to them a non-essential. But a command of God is never non-essential, and no man has a right to measure its comparative importance." God had ordained that Aaron and his sons should cover the ark, "and when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary and all the furniture of the sanctuary . . . after that, the sons of Kahath shall come to bear it; but they shall not touch the sanctuary lest they die" (Num. 4: 4, 5, 15).

When the procession came to the threshing floor of Nachon (I. Chron. 13: 9 R. V. Chidon) Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God, and took hold of it, for the oxen stumbled (or were restive or threw it down). It was a direct violation of the command that they should not touch the holy things. "What," you may say, "should they have left it to be thrown on the ground by the oxen?" Surely He whose presence with the ark could destroy the Philistines' idol, could have cared also for the ark! God could not draw back from his Word; "the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error; and there he died by the ark of God" (II. Sam. 6: 6, 7). It is not an easy thing for a man to bear rebuke when he has taken great pains to please. And David at first felt greatly injured. He was vexed in spirit, displeased with God! For the moment, his wonted loyalty gave way: "he was afraid of the Lord that day, and he said, How shall the ark of God come unto me?" And, instead of bringing the ark to Jerusalem, he carried it aside into the house of Obed-edom, the Gittite.

It is under the pressure of such a test that we learn to know our own hearts. David had been true under his long test with Saul, and not one word of anger or of retaliation was spoken by him.

THE MARKET-PLACE OF TROMSO, NORWAY

A TOUR ABOVE THE ARCTIC CIRCLE

ACROSS THE WHITE SEA AND BEYOND, WHERE THE SUN SHINES TWENTY-TWO HOURS DAILY

TRONDHJEM, NORWAY, July 22.

AFTER a week of almost incessant travel and sightseeing at Stavanger, Bergen, Alesund, Molde, Christiansund, and other places, I now find myself in Trondhjem, the "Cradle of the Kingdom," and in many respects the eldest and most interesting city of Norway. Near the coast, it is delightfully located on the south shore of a grand fiord, and occupies both banks of the serpentine river Nid. With verdure-clad mountains for a background, a short summer climate as genial as that of Italy, and twenty-two hours of daily sunshine, it is so much unlike our American cities, except in size, that an attempted comparison would be futile. It is the largest city in the world for so high a latitude, being only three degrees south of the Arctic Circle. During June and July there is practically no night here. In the evening, as I walked about the city, at eleven o'clock, it was still as light as day. I saw two carpenters at that hour laying corrugated iron roofing; a gardener was cultivating potatoes; a man with a scythe was mowing grass in the field; fishermen were unloading from their boats the daily catch, and men, women and children were promenading in the parks. No artificial lights are used or needed in the city these nights. A good harbor, railroad and steamboat connections, well-stocked stores, street improvements, good residences, churches, schools, factories, and other modern improvements are here. The city is brilliantly illuminated by electricity during the season of long nights, the power for this, as well as for the excellent electric car service, being transmitted from the great waterfalls five miles away. Municipal ownership of these franchises is a success. Technical schools, museums, college and university education, and the thrift and enterprise of the people, give abundant proof that Trondhjem will continue the "Queen of the North." The town was founded by Olaf, the first Christian king, in the year 997. For centuries, Norway's kings have been crowned in the magnificent cathedral here. The State religion is Lutheran, but other forms of worship are tolerated.

Yesterday, while our steamer was entering the beautiful Molde fiord, we suddenly came into the presence of Emperor William's great white yacht, the Hohenzollern, and her escort, a large white warship, and three black torpedo boats, the latter having the appearance of enormous fish with their fins and backs slightly visible. We had heard that the German Emperor was somewhere off the Norwegian coast and thought we might see him at Trondhjem or the Lofoten Islands, where he frequently spends a few days in the summer season. We were, therefore, not a little surprised and delighted to find his fleet anchored in front of Molde. We were so near that we could see the Emperor and his twelve-year-old daughter walking together on the deck, while the sailors were getting ready for departure. The Emperor gives more attention to his only girl than to all his boys. Usually, whenever he goes fishing, hunting, boating, walking or riding, she goes with him. Some of the women of Molde, who have seen the royal family every day for the past week, say that the little girl is "a spoiled child." William says she takes more of his time than does the rest of his empire. He says that "she forgets that he is the Emperor, but never forgets that she is the Emperor's daughter." The Emperor was so delighted at the birth of his daughter, after having such a large family of sons, that he liberated most of the women prisoners in his empire.

MR. NORTH IN ARCTIC TRAVELING COSTUME

When this photograph was taken, Mr. North wore underneath the coat shown a pair of fur trousers, 2 coats, 2 pairs heavy stockings, 2 pairs gloves, and 3 fur caps, besides the clothes worn

An old Norse hermit lives the sole Robinson Crusoe of a small island not far from Molde. He allows no other person to visit his sacred island home except William and his little daughter. The Emperor visits the old hermit every time he comes to Norway, and greatly enjoys the unreserved familiarity and expressions of equality—such as "Du," instead of "Sie"—that are indulged in by the aged rustic.

The German Emperor seems to have won the hearts of the people of Norway by his frequent summer tours among them. Beaming of cannon from the innocent looking little fortifications, gave an appropriate good-by salute to the Emperor, who, with his escort in a long line, swiftly glided out of the harbor for a cruise in the colder regions of the Lofoten Islands and the "Land of the Midnight Sun."

After leaving Trondhjem, I continued my course round the North Cape, visiting most of the important towns along the coast, going in and out of the granite buttressed fiords and threading between the high rocky islands, where ten centuries ago, the daring Norse sea rovers recruited for the conquest of England and France. The magnificent panorama of scenery unfolded itself in stern grandeur. Mountains, glaciers, waterfalls, swarms of sea birds, whales, seals, fir trees, barren shores, beautiful little towns and native fishermen, each and all served to heighten the interest of the journey.

At Tromso—the largest and most beautiful town above Trondhjem—we again met Emperor William and his little girl returning South from the Lofoten Islands. Hammerfest—the most Northern city in the world and an important trading and fishing port—was our next stopping point. Expeditions to Spitzbergen and the Polar Sea often start out from here. Next we reached was the fishing town of Vardo, numbering about 3,000 people. It is the extreme northeast corner of Norway, and contains the most northern fortification in the world. The sun has not once set here during the last six weeks. Rasmus S. Hobaltse, a veteran Norseman of eighty-one, the oldest Consul in the world, represents Russia at this port, and his son, Karl, is British Consul here. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are familiar with the common experiences of the ordinary traveler in the more frequented parts of Europe, but there are very few English-speaking people who come to this extreme outpost in the Arctic Ocean. The town has a good harbor protected by a large new breakwater. Though much farther north than some other cities whose harbors are frozen during winter, the port of Vardo is free from ice the year round. From the rocky heights overlooking the town, one obtains an excellent view of the solemn ocean stretching northward to the Pole, and a faint glimpse of the shore of Finland to the south.

Hjelder, or poles, fastened on a stake in the water, are seen everywhere. Many poles round about Vardo are devoted to this purpose. The Lofoten cod's hjelder, with young cod fish drying on a pole, is replaced to the passenger later, near the Arctic. Seasons of seals and white whales were driven into a bay just outside of the harbor and captured this spring. Here, as in Hammerfest, and all other towns of Norway, the

THE GIFT OF THE MORNING STAR

A Sermon by Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, D.D.

in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

TEXT—REVELATIONS 2: 28: "I will give him the morning star"

EACH one of the messages to the churches of Asia closes with a promise. They contain threats and warnings and commandments, but at the close stands the promise like a distant hill in sunshine, seen through the storm, to lure on ever the worst-beaten to the better things of God and man. The messages lay down the moral task without compromise, but they close with the assurance that

> The toppling crags of duty scaled
> Are close upon the shining tablelands,
> To which our God Himself is moon and sun.

There is here a twofold aspect of life which every morally earnest man is acquainted with. He knows that its conditions are stern, that there is vigor in it, but he knows also that the vigor is blended with tenderness. that all its struggle is permeated by promise. We might indeed say that moral earnestness and hopefulness go together. Stand loyally under the bower of duty, and you will hear the bird of hope sing.

Unfaithfulness to the moral ideal breeds pessimism of the worst kind; fidelity, while it does not encourage cheap and lightsome optimism, does inscribe in the heart of the blackest duty the shining word of the coming time. God has so made us that enfolded in the bosom of loyalty lies the assurance of triumph for the good.

Now it is this loyalty to the good, this fidelity to the moral ideal, this persevering attitude, which I take to be indicated in the word "overcoming" or "conquering." Every promise is made to him who "overcometh" or who "conquers." Not, mark you, to him who has overcome, or who has conquered in any full or final sense. These promises are not of gifts to be bestowed at the end of the course, but of experiences to be realized in going on, so long as you go on in the right way.

Now, is it a fact—for it is no use preaching theories away from the facts of life—that the promise made to those Asian churches in the name of Christ, sent to them by John as direct from Christ, are to be regarded as promises made to us by God? For myself I cannot regard them so in instances in which they apply to the peculiar conditions of a particular church. We must discriminate and not apply to ourselves the promises or these messages, except so far as they contain truths attested by the experience of men. Indeed, the messages given to the churches of Asia are not entirely from Christ as he was, not from Christ as we understand him to-day, but from Christ as John understood him. When we read the promises of the moral life, we read not only the facts of our moral experience, but also a certain interpretation given by more than one bias, such as the personal bias or the national bias. The future we depict may be in essence guaranteed by the universal laws of the moral life, but the depiction may bear personal or national colors, which must fade; personal and national elements which must be eliminated. John was a Christian, but he was also a Jew. Like every man, he had a temperament, both the nationality and the personality would affect his vision of the future. Our Christ never takes absolute, and full, and exclusive possession of us, our understanding of him has some mixture of ourselves in it, which is not in him.

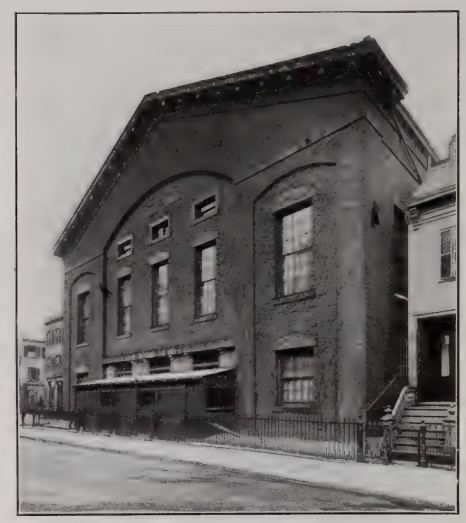
"To him that overcometh and keepeth my word will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of a potter shall be broken to shivers, even as I received of my Father." Here are words attributed to Jesus which none of us would like to think of him as speaking. We could not find in Jesus any promise of authority over nations to rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of a potter are broken to shivers; nor do we think of him as claiming to have received such from his Father. That is not our way of thinking of Christ to-day.

Then how did John come to hear Christ say that? Because John had been reared in the atmosphere and fed upon the sentiments of the second Psalm, in which those words occur. His Jewish teachers had taught him to regard that Psalm as Messianic. And what was the Messiah to do? The Lord said to him, "Ask of me, and I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession. Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." Some Jews sometimes believed that that was one of the things the Messiah would do.

When a Jew came to believe that Jesus was the Messiah, you would think that he would at least throw off that old notion. Jesus had said, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." "I am meek and lowly in heart." "Blessed are the meek," "Whosoever smiteth thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." The general character and teaching of Jesus was the very opposite of the second Psalm conception of the Messiah.

This is not very surprising when you remember that Christians even yet take the second Psalm to refer to Jesus. Nothing could be more unlike Jesus of Nazareth than the description of the Messiah in some other Psalms. How, for example, can we imagine him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," being of the spirit of him who said, "Happy shall he be who taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." It is high time to protest, as Cheyne does, against the habit of "finding Christ," in passages "unrelated to Christ and his religion." "I fear," says Canon Cheyne, "that our unmitigated adoption of the Psalter as it stands may counteract that spirit of love which is one-half of Christianity."

I have always maintained that there is a severity in the law of life, that Divine love is not softness, nor mercy a license to indulgence; pain, suffering, retribution are here; there was a severity in Jesus because Jesus was true to life's law, but the Spirit of Jesus was not the spirit of the imprecatory psalms, and the Messiah of many psalms is quite unlike our Christ. So far as we are under their influence we need to excoriate ourselves and clear our vision.



PLYMOUTH CHURCH, BROOKLYN

But this promise is colored not only by John's nationalism, but possibly also by certain traits of his personal character. It was John who saw a man casting out devils in Jesus' name and forbade him, because he did not follow with them—there was a strong party spirit in him. John was one of the two disciples who wanted the chief places in the kingdom regardless of the position of the other ten. He, too, wanted to call fire from heaven upon the Samaritans. The portrait of John in most people's minds, as the loving disciple, rests upon the fourth Gospel and the Epistles, but the temper sometimes displayed in the Apocalypse fits with the indications of the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke.

I think I have said enough to show that in reading the promises to the Christians of Asia we must learn to discriminate, and to recognize what were the merely personal and the national features, as we must also get behind the figures, before we find the underlying truths which may be valid for Christians. When we do that, however, there is a great deal in them. They read deep into life. You can interpret them from vital experience.

What does the man who is faithful find? What does he get to feel sure of? He finds the very best there is in life. He tastes life at its best, "I will give him to eat of the tree of life, which is in the Paradise of God." There is a very common notion that though goodness may be a safe track to some far-off celestial city it is a considerable sacrifice of the content of life here and now. Naturally enough not a few decide to take what they can in the present and leave the strugg for goodness alone and chance the future. Well, t truth is that only in a worthy character, in the ascen ency over evil, in the mastery of impurity and of egois in all its forms, on the higher levels of special cultiv tion, does a man really get the core of life now, get t very best there is in it. In fact, the old Eden sto comes true again and again in the lives of men. If y decide to get your pleasure, satisfy your desire in illic ways, in defiance or in neglect of the Divine order life, it simply means paradise lost. You turn yourse out of the best by so doing. Loyalty to goodness the way of blessedness. There is no happiness li that which comes from simple goodness.

What does the victor find? He finds the unsee reserves from which he may draw sustenance and pow to his own surprise and that of the world. "To hi that overcometh I will give to eat of the hidden manna In the winning struggle you find soul sustenance whic is hidden from you before you begin the struggle, a which is always hidden from the world. New con dences, new assurances, new faiths arise in the sou new visions break upon it, new voices speak to it and i it; new communions with unseen powers enric its inner solitudes, and the man gets by and l to understand what Paul meant when he spok of being "strengthened with might in the inn man." The truly earnest man who persever in the life of the good is constantly surprise at the reserve of power upon which he draw Red Seas which looked as if they meant ce tain death have been safely crossed, and t song of triumph rang up to God on the oth side.

Difficulties which seemed insurmountabl have been successfully overcome. This is wh the man says: "Hitherto hath the Lord helpe me." He cannot understand himself by hin self, and so he builds an altar to a higher powe In life's victories we discover life's forces; i the onward march we discover the enrichmer of the way, come to one after another of th wells of salvation, hidden from all who do n march that way. And, remember always, tha the larger our conquest in life, the more abu dant will be life's sustenance; it is the conquer who finds the manna.

In a sense, everything is hidden from u and all growth is a discovery. It is so in th intellectual sphere. You discover treasures a you conquer difficulties. You must conque the alphabet and the spelling-book to discove the sentence; conquer the sentence to discove the paragraph; conquer every paragraph t know the treasure of the book. And so all th way up. Many cannot read a book that is a all difficult; the food there is in it they cannc appropriate. Why? because their conquest are too small; they have not overcome ignor ance and superficialty sufficiently, so the mann there remains hidden.

The same is true in the moral and spiritua sphere. There are people who are quite ir capable of understanding the highest kind of affectio and the holiest kind of love because they have not them selves overcome the vulgarity and coarseness of huma nature's lower levels. All noble souls have "meat to ea which the world knows not of;" they have affection which the world would always dilute with base ingredi ents, and aspirations which it would always tarnish wit the stains of earth. Be sure of it, your discovery of life best things will depend upon your conquest of its worst and with every victory you shall eat hidden manna an be strengthened for victories yet to be achieved. Th successful struggle constantly discovers supports hid den from him before, and still hidden from lives whicl do not know the loftier reaches and the more earnes endeavors.

What does life yield to the victor? Here is one o the finest of promises: "I will give him the morning star." What is this gift of the morning star? It is th feeling that life is sweet and pure, fair and fresl with the touch of morning. It is the feeling tha life is full of promise, that day is coming on that the best is yet to be. It is the power to b oneself a sweetening, freshening influence in the world a living prophecy of its betterment. Now, friends there is nothing like moral purity to keep the touch o morning on life; compromise your morality, and it is marvelous how soon everything is stale.

There is an indescribable sweetness in the air o early morning when the world is as God makes it when it is indeed in the process of his remaking before we light our fires and emit our smoke and beat up th dust of our noisy, turbulent life. Something like tha sweet freshness of morning belongs to the soul that is

A·WARNING·CALL TO AMERICAN·MOTHERS

By·Margaret·Bottome

HOW little did I dream when I went down to Ocean Grove this summer what awaited me. I went to meet a sister from the West. She said to me (naming a lady whose distinguished husband was well known), "Mrs. —— has been to me, and tells me her heart is burdened for the Christian mothers of this country. She feels that here, where there are thousands of mothers, they should be called together for united prayer for their children. She then asked me if I would lead such a meeting. I told her, my sister, Mrs. Bottome, would be here next day, and we would meet any mothers who would like to come together for that purpose."

Bishop Fitzgerald approved most kindly of the request, and the next day we took our way to the little chapel, where the daily Mothers' Meeting is held. I was surprised to find so many ladies there. They represented nearly all the evangelical denominations. Day after day we mothers met. Some had fought the battle and had won; and their children were useful Christian sons and daughters. There were those who had prayed and waited many years for answers to prayer, and were yet waiting; but they were full of faith. There were young mothers who were thankful for the help they received from day to day. I heard of one woman who came in to the Mothers' Meeting, who was perfectly discouraged. She had given up all hope, and was about leaving for home, feeling hard toward God and about every one else. While listening to a mother who told of a wayward boy, her heart was touched, and at last the work was done. She came to God for herself.

This matter of being right ourselves was spoken of again and again, in those remarkable gatherings. It is what we are that instructs our children much more than what we say. It does not read, "Teach up a child in the way he should go," but "train up a child," training and teaching are very different. You make a lattice for the morning glory, and somehow it clings to the lattice and the lattice holds it.

How well I know that it is what a mother is, rather than what she says, that does the business. There are seven of our children, as we still call ourselves now, and mother, who has been in Heaven nearly a quarter of a century, remains still a most important influence in our lives. It is certainly not because she said so much, but she was so much. To be sure, she had a few passages of Scripture that were so intensely real to her that she made them real to us. One was, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," and it has gone down into our families to our children, and children's children, and so we still say, "Well, as mother used to say," and the grandchildren say, "As grandmother used to say," and it looks as if it might go still down from generation to generation. She did not talk much; she knew what many a mother does not know—the power of stillness.

In those days, in that little chapel at Ocean Grove, much came back to me that I had forgotten, and I seemed to live my life over again. How glad I should be if I could give the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the incidents, the illustrations, that we received from each other, day after day. At the close of the meeting, as we were about to separate, we looked the matter over, and felt that this ought to be the start of a movement among Christian mothers throughout the length and breadth of this land. We know there are great churches in this country, formed for helpfulness for mothers, but this is something different. Our desire is that innumerable circles shall be formed, most perhaps small, in parlors, or in some room connected with the church, to which the leader of the circle belongs; mothers should meet for simply one purpose, united prayer and united faith for their children, and to pray for children who are neglected; to pray for salvation from sin.

I think we are hardly awake to our awful neglect of morality in our children. Boys and girls are going to destruction; mothers are not taking care of the immortal interests of their children, they do not know where they go; they know not the company they keep; mothers and children are not intimate. In the years that have passed, as I have corresponded with the young women of this country, I have been astonished beyond measure, at the kind of letters I have received. They have asked me if they might be confidential with me, telling me frankly they could not confide in their mothers; that their mothers really had no knowledge of their real life. Where is the fault? I think it is greatly with mothers. The claims of society in many cases have seemed to take the place of the claims of the family. Girls are not educated by their mothers; they are often sent away from home to be educated, that their mothers may have time for something else. Mothers seem to lose sight of the necessity of making friends of their children. It is not enough to be the mother of a child; on that natural relationship there must be grafted friendship. A mother must enter into the youthful interests of a child; she must cultivate her own child.

None of us who attended these meetings at Ocean Grove will ever forget the woman who told us of her intense desire to make home so attractive that her boy would spend his evenings there. The lad had inherited her love for music, and though she was so tired after doing the day's work that it seemed at first almost impossible for her to give the boy music lessons at night, yet every evening she did it. And she had the joy of seeing him so interested, that nothing could take him away from home in the evening. That woman has lived to have all the music come back to her, and to see him entertain not only his mother, but many others. It cost her something, but she is paid for it.

None of us will ever forget the account from Idaho, whose son said, "I am going to the far West, mother, to make my fortune." She said while her heart ached and she was inclined to cry. "Don't leave your mother," she bethought herself that God was in Idaho too. And she told us of the joy that had come to her when that son wrote, "I have found a great deal of land, mother, and some day you and father will not have to work so hard—you will come here, and I will take care of you."

One incident none of us will ever forget. A mother had an only child, a boy, and all that a mother could do she said she had done to make him a real Christian. He went astray and left his home, and did not even tell where he was. She wrote to her former minister and told him her sorrow, and added, "I have cast him on God's altar when he was an infant." The minister wrote back, "Let him lie there." The woman's faith sprang up in a moment, and all her trouble was gone. He was on God's altar and no one could take him off that altar. God would take care of what was on his altar. Only a short time elapsed before a letter came from him. He said, "I happened to get in the crowd that was making its way into the Hall to hear Dr. Moody, so I went on with the crowd and at the door I met Mr. Moody, and he extended his hand and smiled and said, 'Come along,' and in I went, half-dazed and under the impression that Mr Moody knew me (of course he did not), and in the Hall I heard Mr. Moody preach and Mr. Sankey sing." There he met God and left that Hall a sincere penitent, and he afterwards wrote his mother that he had become a Christian.

In that mothers' meeting many a mother said in her heart, "I laid him on God's altar. I will let him lie there." I think the Master whispered to more than one woman that afternoon, "Oh, woman, great is thy faith. Be it unto thee even as thou wilt."

Mothers need help in faith. We must have holy mothers, wise mothers, mothers devoted to the home, to make it a refuge, a joy.

Everything tends now towards drifting from a home. I heard one woman say to another not long ago in the cars, "Is it true that you are going to give up your beautiful house, and go into a hotel apartment house?" The one addressed answered, "I am tired of housekeeping. I have persuaded my husband to store our furniture." I wondered if there were children. I can see, when there are no children, how a room might become a home, but I certainly think there are signs that the word "home" will not mean much to the rising generation, if we do not look out. We hear much of clubs among our women, but no club can take the place of "home." We want mothers and homes to-day.

ure and comes to it always in its hour of victory over in. As long as your affections are clean, they are resh; you never tire of pure feelings or holy loves. Once they mix with earthliness, then they grow common—you are in the world as man makes it; the world which even darkens the sky with its own pollution.

No sight is more sad anywhere, than that of a youth etting out in life without moral discriminations to drain he cups of the world's pleasures, only to find that one fter the other nauseates, everything palls, the world is at and stale, and the very capacity for pleasure dies ut of him. For such a man there is only one way to ake the world young again. That is through the oral struggle. "The first deep contrition for sin, the rst real daily walk or midnight watch with the living od, the first opening perspective of a life in death—hese things are to many, like the emergence from a ark, chill cave, to the flood of warm, beautifying light."

O, man, to whom life is spoiled by moral surrenders, nd all beauty stained by sin, and to whom all sensaion is blunted by indelicacy, if you turn to face the oral ideal, and bend your energy in moral endeavor, ive to fight sin in the strength of God, you will yet ind that the dullness, the dead weight, the insipidity, he staleness, will go off, and you will find one standing by you in the fight, saying, "I will give thee the morning star." "If iniquity be in thy hand, put it far away, nd let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles. For hen shalt thou lift up thy face without spot. Thine ge shall arise above the noon-day, thou shalt shine orth, thou shalt be as the morning" (Job 11: 14-17), lean, fresh, and full of promise once again. And the world shall come up before you in new aspects; hope shall take the place of despair, and faith drive out fear, even "the wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." The morning star shall arise on the soul and on the world. God's dawn shall announce God's day, and "thou shalt be steadfast and shalt not fear."

Again, what does the moral victor find? It is promised that Christ will write upon him God's name and the name of God's city, and his own name. In our language, this means that life yields the victor the consciousness that he really belongs to God; that he belongs to the new society: that he belongs to Christ. In other words, the spiritual universe owns him, and he knows himself as a vital part of it, even as a pillar in the temple of God, an upholder of the sacred things of life: one of those who have a real, permanent life in the sanctuary, among the sanctities of God—yea, who share the spiritual sovereignty of life with God, with Christ, and with all the good, "He shall sit with me on my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne."

Oh, you who are fighting sin, take courage: with every triumph you are mounting the steps of the throne of God, and ever nearing the time when your life shall be fixed in the truth which knows no turning, and the righteousness which is forever.

Lay hold on the thought of God as your Helper, and believe that if you work with him all will be well. I invite you to no superficial optimism that has never sounded the depths of life's woe, nor seen into the heart of its tragedy. There is no power and no healing in that. I heard such shallow optimism once proclaimed from a Christian platform. It denounced gloominess of every kind; it slashed the pessimists in every direction; it declared that all things were going on exceedingly well, even the slums were not so bad as some made out, and the war in South Africa, which sat so heavily on the consciences of so many Christian Englishmen, well, it would come to an end some time.

So much of this was dealt out that I felt that superficial optimism was the shallowest of lies, and that to confound it in the name of Christianity was to forget the agony of Gethsemane and to blot out the meaning of the Cross. No, no: if you are to be a serious man, in earnest for the highest ends of life, for yourself and for others, you have a battle to fight: a hard, stern battle: a hundred things are wrong with the world, which you must help to put right. Look the evil in the face, and do not call it good: realize the darkness, and do not call it light. But when you have done that, I ask you to realize a larger fact, viz., that the Alpha and Omega of all this life is the love of the good God. For as sure as the beginning, that is also the end, and let us say

> Hope I may still pursue,
> The Crucified One's arm to find!
> That arm can still restore the lost,
> Yea, it can raise the dead indeed.

With that thought of God let us spend our few brief years fighting sin and serving man, till we pass "to where beyond these voices there is peace."

Now unto the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, be glory and dominion forever and ever.

REVIVAL ✣ TENTS ✣ NOW ✣ FOLDED

CLOSING THE FIFTH SEASON OF THE OPEN-AIR GOSPEL WORK IN PHILADELPHIA

SINCE June 21, from 100 to 125 meetings per week have been conducted by the Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee of Philadelphia. With eight tents, four stereopticons, the Italian Tabernacle, Race street pier, the Lemon Hill Music Pavilion, and other open squares, meetings were held in seventeen different localities daily. The daily aggregate attendance would amount to from 4,000 to 6,000 people. Meetings were held every night with the exception of Saturday. Children's Meetings were held in the afternoon and early evening.

The use of the stereopticon in the open air and vavant lots and city parks was a new and most effective means of drawing and interesting large numbers of people. In the poorest sections of the city where these instruments were most used, the sentiment of the entire community was manifestly changed. The good, old hymns, thrown upon the screen, were learned by the youths, and supplanted to a large degree the ordinary street song. Very often from 1,000 to 1,500 (and as many as 2,500), people would stand for a full hour and observe the pictures and listen reverently to the Gospel address.

The tents have lost none of their advantages. While only seven of the tents were used this year as compared with ten last year, the entire work has been larger, because of the stereopticon and open-air meetings. Ordinarily the tents are moved to new districts after three or four weeks. In one section, however, a tent remained all the season and the services were maintained with ever-increasing interest. The crowd at the closing testimony service, although held on a Monday night, more than filled the tent. Scarcely a night passed in this section without souls being converted.

It is impossible to measure the far-reaching results of such work. In the tents fully 1,000 have indicated a purpose to lead Christian lives. One lamentable fact revealed is that many of those reached have once been connected with some church and had wandered away.

The best available evangelists and evangelistic pastors were engaged to preach. Almost all of those receiving some remuneration were engaged for at least two weeks. Ten helpers were employed, seven being students from Princeton. These acted in each place as overseers and helpers. They visited in the homes, helped in the after-meetings, and were in point of effectiveness scarcely second to the evangelist. Two ladies were engaged to help in the children's meetings. Dr. Lange, Superintendent of the Philadelphia County Sabbath School Association, was engaged to superintend the Children's Department.

Every Sabbath morning the General Secretary preached in Fairmount Park in the Lemon Hill Music Pavilion to a great audience. The evening service was under the auspices of the Second Presbyterian Church, Rev. Charles Wood, D.D., pastor. Every Monday at noon a rally of evangelists and workers would meet in the Auditorium of the Witherspoon Building to he reports of the week's work, and be addressed by so minister or evangelist. Marked interest develop among the policemen, who were always most help and reverent listeners. Many striking incidents of c version have been witnessed.

More than 400,000 people in the aggregate have tended the services during the summer. Twelve th sand dollars have been expended on the work. collections were taken at the services. The fun necessary were secured by personal subscription. all probability the kind of work done in the summer means of tents will be carried on in the winter in ha and theatres, in addition special effort in the church

EVANGELIST SMILEY ADDRESSING THE LOCOMOTIVE BUILDERS AT THE BALDWIN WORKS

SUMMER SOUL-WINNING IN INDIANA

AS one of the many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I send to you an account of our Gospel Tent Work here at Newburg, Ind., this summer. Early in July we erected our tent and began open-air work. Great results have come from these meetings. We secured the services of five young men with musical instruments and an organ. This feature of tent work was a very effective one. I believe in using all the known musical instruments in God's praise, and to lead souls to Christ.

Our town has been greatly benefited by the tent work. Surely this is God's plan of reaching the class who never enter church. We are commanded to "preach to every creature," and to do this we must go where they are, or where we can reach them in the best way possible. Is it not time for us, as ministers of Christ, instead of taking vacation in summer, to make strong appeals in be half of "the last man" who has foun himself away from God?

It is a pleasure, much enjoye and appreciated, to spend the sum mer months with our friends or rela tions in a distant State, perhap among the scenes of our childhood but what is it compared to the joy o leading even one soul to Christ?

May the Lord move all the pas tors to tell to the world of his "won derful love," even in the summer time The evangelization of the world de pends very much on this plan of work

Great Artistic Merit

It is difficult to express to you on a postal my appreciation of the beautiful pictures constituting the "Family Art Gallery." I truly thank you for this generous gift on your part. "Good" is hardly sufficient to indicate the artistic merit of the pictures. I expect to have several of them framed. W. R. WALKER.

eople have excellent public schools. I met Norwe-ian boys and girls of fifteen who could speak good nglish, having learned it in the middle class at school. ank, post-office, telegraph and telephone offices, four onsulates, a fine church, a large schoolhouse, fort, rge hospital, and fish warehouses are some of the rominent features of the town. Norsemen, ins, Lapps, and Russians are seen on the reets.

Norway is an intensely democratic coun-y. Titled aristocracy has been abolished y law. Norway has no idol. Most of the eople desire a republic like ours, but it is ifficult to see wherein their personal lib-rty could be greatly enhanced. The king f Sweden and Norway has less power than he President of the United States. Norway as no standing army. Every householder as a flag-pole standing by the side of his esidence, from which he often displays the orwegian flag.

Education in Norway is compulsory, and eligious instruction, according to the Lu-theran creed, is taught in the public schools. Religion here is too formal

The social side of life in Norway will compare favorably with our country, England, Germany, or France. Christiana is the social and political capital. Life in the country differs greatly from that of the city. There is less drunkenness in Norway than in England or America. With many limitations a few salient points of the government deal out spirits in communities, where, by special vote, the people allow it. There is a strong temperance party in the parliament. Suffrage is practically universal for men, and women too. Very poor, and very rich people are scarce in Norway. I see no "first-class" passengers on the railroad trains. The people are industrious, quiet, and honest. They are also brave and undaunted as were their ancestors, and women so much feared in England and France. My next letter will be from Archangel. I shall skirt the coast of Lapland on the Arctic Sea, and then the coast of Finland as I pass down the White Sea. From many different quarters in these latitudes one hears of the good work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and of Dr. Klopsch's mission of relief last winter to the famine-stricken Laps and Finns. I have already been told of it by Finlanders and Scandinavians.

"PREACH JESUS TO ME"

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BY CHARLES NOEL DOUGLAS

WE'VE got a new minister coming, I hear; the old one I'm told 's had his day.
Too old-fashioned and slow, and not up to date; at least so the younger folks say,
So the man who's grown gray in the service of God, forever aside now must stand,
While a youth fresh from college, with brand new ideas, is going to take things in hand;
And we'll hear the old truths told over again, from Genesis way down to Paul,
And told in the latest most new-fangled way, so that no one will know them at all.
Well, there's this much I know, whoever may come, and whoever the preacher may be,
If a blessing he wants from this old heart of mine, he's got to preach Jesus to me!

"A youth fresh from college"

The old style of preaching the Gospel of God, with eloquence simple and strong,
Repentance, salvation, through Jesus who died, they've discovered at last is all wrong;
And instead we have lectures on various things, political, social, and such,
All told in a genteel, half-hearted way, with a matter-of-fact sort of touch,
And about as much use to a hungering soul, as 'twould be if you gave it a stone,
All food for the mind, for the spirit and heart, must be left most severely alone,
Not a word in the whole discourse will you hear of the Cross and of grim Calvary. [Jesus to me.
Well—such kind of fare, it may satisfy some; but you've got to preach

Ah me! what a change has come over the land, from the days that I once knew of old,
When the good pastor's voice, so grand and inspired, in sonorous majesty rolled,
And we heard the old story of God and his love, and of Jesus the Saviour of men,
And the next Sabbath day, with the same eager hearts, we came back to hear it again.
We never grew weary, we never grew tired, of that tale of God's wonderful love,
Our religion we drew not from books or from men, but straight from the Father above.
For the grace that He gave us came down like the rain, so plenteous, so full, and so free,
And it's that blessed grace that my thirsty soul craves, so preach the dear Saviour to me.

"And we never grew weary"

Ah! in those good old days, a spade was a spade, and sin, it was nailed down as sin;
No trimming of sails to suit this one and that, but the shafts of the Gospel sank in
The wrong-doer's heart, and rich man or poor, face to face, in an instant was brought
With the terrible price the sinner must pay who sets God's commandments at naught.
No parleys with Sin, temporizing with wrong, but heart searching within and without,
Ah! the wonderful faith of those blessed old days, with never a question or doubt,
Just the Bible—God's word from beginning to end—and to those precious pages I flee,
And I pick out the texts that thrilled me with joy, when the Saviour was first preached to me.

"The shafts of the Gospel sank in"

It's all very well, in the heyday of youth, to criticize, question, discuss,
But to those who have reached the evening of life, Ah, how different it all is with us!
With the scythe of the Reaper coming daily more near, and the eves growing dimmer with age. [precious page.
Oh! don't take the comfort the Holy Book gives, as we ponder o'er each
Oh! take not away, but add if you can, for there's nothing to cheer our last breath, [of death,
No, nothing but those blessed pages to help, as we draw near the portals
Ah, there's naught but our Lord that can then stand between our souls and Eternity, [to me.
So give me the light of God's Gospel, and preach Christ Jesus the Saviour

"The comfort the Holy Book gives"

Preach Jesus, Him only, and if you'll do that, there's no other topic you'll need,
He is the food that the multitude craves, if only their voices you'd heed,
For the world it is hungry for some one to come and arouse it from out of its sleep,
And into the heavenly garners of God, a harvest of souls you will reap.
It isn't that people are weary of church, or that spiritual matters have tired,
But the preachers have strayed from the old paths of faith, and no longer are thrilled and inspired,
So back to the Cross and the crucified One, and Oh! glorious the harvest will be,
And the whole world will ring with the joy of the saved—so preach Jesus to them and to me.

Why Ministers Are Scarce

FROM college newspapers we learn that there is a decrease in the number of young men who are studying for the ministry. What is the cause of the decrease? Has the pulpit lost its attraction for young men? Has zeal in the service of Jesus so cooled that young men no longer desire to enter it? The questions are serious, for preaching is the divinely appointed means by which recruits are to be won for the church. As the Apostle Paul asks, How shall they hear without a preacher?

A possible explanation of the decline in the popularity of the ministerial calling may be found in a notice recently published by one of the denominational journals. It announces that several ministers are needed for circuit work. Candidates must be under fifty years of age; if they have any families they must be small ones; must be able to furnish a house and bring their furniture in at their own expense; must have clear heads, warm hearts and be sound in doctrine. The salary offered is $400 or $500 a year to the right man, if he is not afraid of work. We may add that he should also not be afraid of starvation, as, if he has even a small family to support on his salary, and has to keep up the respectable appearance expected of a minister, the modicum of money left to buy food must be of the smallest.

Is it any wonder that a young man reading such a notice at the beginning of his career should decide not to enter the ministry. He could earn more than that laying bricks, or in any of the mechanical trades, and if he has the genius qualifying him for the ministry he might earn a better livelihood in any of the professions. For the honor of the church, for the sake of the name of Christ, the men who devote themselves to the ministry ought to receive more compensation than that offered.

We can imagine what must be the life of a man who undertakes ministerial work on such a salary. How the constant struggle to make both ends meet must wear upon his spirit! How the distraction of debt and of the necessity for strict economy must occupy his mind and interfere with the efficient discharge of his duty! What mental starvation must be endured by the man who can never buy a new book or subscribe for a secular or religious journal! The church practises suicidal economy in so crippling its servants. It cannot get from them the best work they are capable of doing, unless it relieves them of the sordid cares of life.

Besides this, there is the far-sighted view of the future of the ministry, of which we have an indication in the dearth of candidates for the pastorate. There is Apostolic authority for the maxim that "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and there is common-sense ground for contending that the hire should be worthy of the man. If it is realized that in the ministry the remuneration is ridiculously inadequate, the men who enter it will be fewer and of poorer calibre from year to year. It is time that the churches contemplated this prospect. Unless an improvement is made, disaster is inevitable. Every church which is giving its pastor an insufficient salary, should get together and make an effort to redeem its name from disgrace.

Mosquitoes

WE wonder how often in the past mosquito-tormented summer some of us have asked wonderingly, "Why does God permit the existence of such provoking pests?" Their hum, their bite, their attack in force, for this year they have come in clouds, armies, and battalions, all prove disastrous to comfort and to peace. The theory hotly advanced by recent investigators that they are the bringers of malaria, yellow fever, and other diseases, is alternately accepted and contradicted, yet it seems highly probable that the irritability they produce, may help on the conditions favorable to fevers and maladies of the blood. Away with the mosquito, we cry, lavishing kerosene by the gallon on the ponds and swamps where he breeds; anointing ourselves with citronella and pennyroyal essence in the hope of discouraging his proximity, and screening our houses and verandas so that he dashes against the wire netting in vain. This last precaution is, on the whole, the best armor against the persistent marauders. A thoroughly screened room, porch, or dwelling will resist the inroads of the tiny foe, and rout him in swift defeat. Instead of complaining and fretting try wire netting and mosquito gauze, and possess your soul in patience.

Why God permits these pestiferous mosquitoes to exist we do not know, but in the economy of nature he has provided other creatures that war upon them, and we may protect these. Meanwhile, as a discipline, perhaps we ought not revile the tiny plagues that will vanish with the frost.

Safeguards at the World's Fair

THERE is an impression abroad that the management of the World's Fair, which is to be held at St. Louis next year, has not exercised sufficient care in some of the arrangements it has made with regard to the giving of "privileges," especially such as will have an influence upon the moral well-being of the multitudes who will visit the Fair from all parts of the Union. If it be true, as some publications allege, that at the very gates of the Fair, where millions will pass and repass daily and thousands will lodge, there are to be resorts of a character not to be named in decent society, it will be an irredeemable blot upon the whole enterprise.

For the sake of the fathers and mothers of America, and of the vast numbers of young people of both sexes, who are looking forward with agreeable anticipation to next year's visit to St. Louis, we trust that President Francis and his official associates will personally inquire into this important matter. Nothing should be left undone to convince the nation that the Fair will be free from moral stain, in all of its surroundings. If vice, even in the slightest degree, is to be permitted to obtrude itself, this fact would operate to keep many away. But we believe that the management, knowing the danger, will adopt and rigidly enforce such rules as will satisfy the most exacting. The city authorities, too, should co-operate heartily in this. Even in its exterior surroundings, the Fair must be kept clean, and no shadow of vice should be allowed to fall across its entrances. It is an enterprise that belongs to the whole nation, and the multitudes who intend to visit it have a right to be assured that in their sojourn at the great Exposition, they will be surrounded by every safeguard necessary for moral as well as physical protection.

We believe the enterprise will be a great success, and this result will be all the more certain, if the management and the St. Louis authorities work together, to make it not only the best but morally the cleanest World's Fair ever held.

Turkish Outrages

RECENT reports from Macedonia have aroused horror the world over. Turkish barbarities appear to have reached their culmination. The description of the atrocities perpetrated at astoria, eclipse the worst outrages hitherto committed that afflicted land. The town lies about thirty-six iles south of Monastir. It had a population of about n thousand. The Turks surrounded it, and set it on e. Every one who fled from the flames was ruthssly murdered, and indescribable barbarities were mmitted on women and children. The report says at the entire population of the town, including old eople and babies, perished. The Turks showed no ercy on account of age or sex. We blame the Macenians for their cruelty and vindictiveness, but such outrage as this is enough to stir the indignation of ny people. We cannot wonder, however much we eplore, that they take revenge when they have opportnity. A carefully prepared statistical statement just sued, gives the names of more than a hundred illages which have shared the same fate, with the mber killed in each case. Nor were the Turks ntent with ordinary killing, but took pleasure in avage cruelty. In one case they are said to have it eighteen living children into the town oven and asted them to death. Other cruelties too horrible speak of are charged against these barbarous avages. The indignation of the Bulgarian people ems now to be beyond control. The Bulgarian overnment has been warned by both Austria and ussia that it must expect no help if it does go to ar with Turkey, but the people cannot much longer e restrained. If war does break out between Turkey nd Bulgaria, the scene of conflict will be widely exended and Bulgaria must be crushed. It is amazing hat all Europe should remain quiet while such horrors re taking place, and the Turk be allowed to work his ill on the helpless people. The difficulty, however, onsists in the fact that the people are not fit for elf-government and that no Power would be willing o see the country given over to the control of another ower. We can but hope and pray that some solution f the difficulty may be found, for we are assured that od, who has all power over the nations, is not indifferent to the suffering inflicted by the wicked.

If thou seest the oppression of the poor, and violent perverting of ustice and judgment in a province, marvel not at the matter: for he that is higher than the highest regardeth; and there be higher han they (Eccles. 5:8).

Courtship in a Cemetery

A wedding ceremony was performed in Baltimore, Md., on Sept. 1, which had a romantic origin. The bridegroom, who is an engineer, used on his holidays to visit the cemetery, to cultivate the plot in which his wife was buried over a year ago. One day, he noticed a lady doing similar work on the adjoining plot. He learned that she was a widow, whose husband was buried there three years ago. He observed her work, and noticing that she needed an implement that he was using in fixing up the creepers, he offered her the use of it. She accepted the loan of it, and an acquaintance began. He continued to visit the cemetery during the spring, and frequently the widow happened to be there, too. They exchanged confidences, and were impressed by the similarity of their feelings. Each had been intensely devoted to the respective dead partner, and their lives had been similarly desolated by their bereavements. Their common sorrow drew them into closer friendship, and, ultimately, they became so much attached to one another, that a marriage was arranged, which has now been solemnized. They will now, one hopes, be able to console one another, and each do something toward filling the void in the other's life. It is not strange that similar grief should draw people together. It would be well if the common love of Christ always drew together Christians, who are separated in the sects. They, too, would find in companionship and comradeship an increase in happiness and power.

I in them, and thou in me that they may be made perfect in one (John 17: 23).

To Color Diamonds

A scientist in Chicago announces a discovery which, if successful, will probably bring a large fortune to the discoverer. All diamond dealers are aware that the value of a diamond is determined to a large extent by its color. Size and clearness are factors in the estimate, but the color is an important quality. The brown diamonds which adorn the crown of King Edward of England would be of far less value if they were white, but the brown color is so rare in the gem, that their value is immensely enhanced. The Chicago scientist believes that with his method he can change the color of a diamond to any desired tint. His plan is to direct the Roentgen rays to some strongly colored substance, and when they are loaded with the required color, to turn them on the diamond the color of which it is designed to change. The rays penetrating the gem, permeate it with the color they carry and leave it there. Experiments have been made which show that the diamond does receive the color, but time alone can prove whether the change is permanent. There is the same doubt about human jewels. We see changes and reformations so often that are not permanent. It is only when the grace of God transforms the nature that we can hope for permanence.

But we, with unveiled face, beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord, are transformed into the same image (II. Cor. 3: 18 R.V.).

Forty Years Separated

The wife of a Methodist clergyman residing in Philipsburg, Pa., has discovered to her surprise, that she has a father living. She supposed herself to be the daughter of a couple formerly living near Trenton, N. J., both of whom are now dead. She is forty-two years of age, and has been married over eighteen years. Recently she paid a visit to two ladies whom she believed to be her sisters. During her visit she learned for the first time, a secret, that had been carefully kept for forty years. It was that she was not the daughter, but only the adopted daughter of the couple whom she had always regarded as her parents. Her real father was a man who had forty years ago been a neighbor of her foster-parents. As he had lost his wife at that time his little two-year-old daughter was glad to visit the neighbor's house, in which there were little children, who became her playmates. Their parents grew to love the motherless little one as their own child, and at last as her father wanted to go West, they adopted her. They did not tell the girl she was not their own, and strictly enjoined a like secrecy on their children. Since their death it was thought best to tell her, especially as her real father had returned to the East. She immediately went to see him, and he, having learned that she had long been dead, was delighted at the reunion. How much happiness Christians might confer if they, like those adopted sisters, would tell those who do not know, that they have a Father in heaven who longs to receive them to his heart.

For the Father himself loveth you (John 16: 27).

A Consumption Lair

A pamphlet just issued by the University Settlement in New York, gives a startling description of a block not far distant from the Settlement, which bears the significant soubriquet of "Lung Block." It is a dirty region of tenement houses, in which it is estimated that a thousand families live. In the last nine years alone, this block has reported 915 cases of consumption. From doctors, druggists, and all others whom I knew, I gathered that this is but half the true number. In a block so congested, dissipation, comes easy. Foul air, darkness, wretched surroundings—these work on the home by day and night. Here a thousand homes struggle on, while hundreds yield and sink, and so pollute the others. So come hundreds of others to take their places and die of the same plague. The stair cases and walls are infested with the tuberculous

THE PRINCE OF PEACE * GOD'S COVENANT WITH DAVID

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 11
II. SAMUEL 7: 4-16

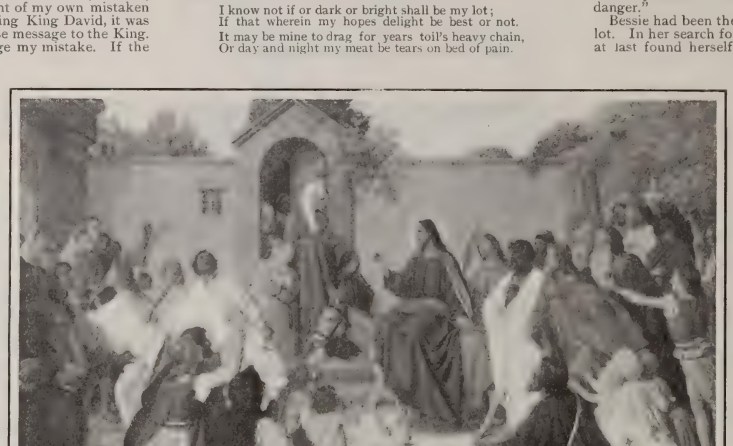
By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- II. SAM. 7: 16:
"THY THRONE SHALL BE ESTABLISHED FOREVER"

LET us listen to the prophet Nathan: "King David had built for himself a magnificent palace of cedar on the hill Zion. In pitiful contrast on the same hill, stood God's house, the Tabernacle, in a tattered condition, having been in use for about four hundred years. Friend of God as he was, King David could but keenly feel the contrast, and so the desire came upon him to build a house for the Lord, and one that should far exceed in grandeur his own palace of cedar. But I was first made aware of his purpose, when he summoned me into his presence to tell me about it. At the first mention, it seemed good to me, and I commended it with all my heart, and pronounced a blessing upon it. But that same night, a greater King, even the Lord God of Hosts, summoned me, that he might express his disapproval of King David's purpose. God conveyed to me the idea that the time was not ripe for such a building, for as yet there was no permanance in the Kingdom of Israel. The wars for conquest of the idolatrous people must still go on, and King David was the "man of blood" to prosecute those wars. And besides, God would have his temple built by a man of peace. In his zeal, King David had exceeded God's wish, for I was distinctly told, by God, to tell King David that he had never given any intimation to any one, that he wanted a home built for himself, and that on the contrary, it was best that he should continue to dwell in the tent and tabernacle, as he had done since he had brought Israel out of Egypt. Not that he wished always to dwell in a tent, but only until such a time as Israel should abide in a place of their own and move no more. I was told by God to tell King David these things, and also that Solomon, his son, should build the "house." On account of my own mistaken judgment in commending and blessing King David, it was hard for me to bear the Lord's adverse message to the King. I was much humiliated to acknowledge my mistake. If the adverse statement had been the whole of the message, my courage might have failed me. But I was made the bearer of a wonderful promise to King David: that God would "make him a house," not meaning another palace, but that he would establish his family forever as a line of Kings. The kingdom of David could only last forever, by culminating in a person who reigns forever, that is, in the Messiah.

If King David was disappointed that God had set aside his plans, there was no trace of it upon his face, but rather, his whole appearance seemed ennobled and exalted, by the greater things which God had in store for him. I had hardly gone beyond the confines of his palace, before I heard his voice in the strains of a "Magnificat," praising God for the honor which he had promised. These are some of the words I heard: "Who am I, O! Lord God? and what is my house that thou hast brought me hitherto? Let thy name be magnified forever, saying, 'The Lord of hosts is the God over Israel,' and let the house of thy servant David be established before thee, and with thy blessing let the house of thy servant be blessed forever."

Let us listen to King David teaching his children: "The great Messiah, who is to be the glory of our family, has been living in heaven since before the world began. Angels have bowed down before him and called him Lord of all (Psalms 2: 7; 97: 7). He came to this world to talk with Adam (Gen. 3: 8), and Enoch (Gen. 5: 24), and Abraham (Gen. 18: 1), and Jacob (Gen. 32: 30), and Moses (Ex. 3: 2), and Joshua (Josh. 5: 13-15), and Gideon (Judges 6: 11). By and by he will come to live among men and be called the "Son of David," and in him our line shall reign forever over the whole world." (Messianic Psalms 2: 18; 45; 72; 110).



"THEY THAT WENT BEFORE HIM CRIED, SAYING, HOSANNA TO THE SON OF DAVID"

Illustration and Application

It makes a difference to God what sort of a man builds his house—that is one timely truth in his lesson; and another is that a man may have a blessed immortality of good influence on earth in Christly descendants. A kindred truth is that God blesses a righteous family, age after age. And another is that God is very merciful to his sinning people. Another truth is that God greatly values peace, and condemns war and bloodshed, as shown in his rejection of David's proposal to build him a house because he was a man of war and blood (Chron. 22: 8; 28: 3), was rejected, and his announcement that he would build that house of stone, and another more enduring, through a human Prince of Peace, his son Solomon, who was a type of the Divine peace-bringer, the great "Son of David." And not the least important lesson of this story, is that the loyal subjects of the Prince of Peace, to whom he has said, "My peace I give unto you," should manifest his wondrous peace day by day, the peace of trust in a kind providence that is guiding the destiny of men, of families and of nations.

A fundamental fact is omitted in this story which David tells twice over in his farewell talks, namely, that God had replied to his proposal to build a temple for God as beautiful as his own royal palace: "Thou had shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build a house unto my name because thou hast shed much blood in my sight" (I. Chron. 22: 8; 28: 3). Then he is told that his son, who will be a prince of peace, type of a greater One to come, shall build the temple. From any point of view this is a Divine condemnation of war and commendation of peace. God tolerated war as he did divorce (Mark 10: 2, 5), because of the hardness of the people's hearts. It would seem also that God not only overruled for good, but even ordered wars in that rude age, and David was taunted for unusual gentleness for that time. But this passage shows that God did not approve all David did in his wars, and he does approve peace rather than war. It is appropriate to insert here the new stanza written during the Boer war for the hymn, "God save the King":

Peace

Lord, let war's tempests cease,
Fold the whole world in peace,
Under thy wings;
Make all the nations one,
All hearts beneath the sun,
Till thou shalt reign alone,
Great King of kings.

Surely the church of the Prince of Peace should more positively oppose the craze of militarism, which next to commercialism is the most serious blot on our Twentieth Christian Century. It is petty ethics to condemn the "hell" of war less than the retail brutality of riots and prize fights. They are all "the call of the wild."

While God overruled David's plan to build a temple, he substituted a greater promise to build a "house" for him that should last forever, a beautiful illustration of how God in denying our prayers gives us something better than we planned.

Overruled Plans

I know not if or dark or bright shall be my lot;
If that wherein my hopes delight be best or not.
It may be mine to drag for years toil's heavy chain,
Or day and night my meat be tears on bed of pain.

Dear faces may surround my hearth with smiles and glee,
Or I may dwell alone, and mirth be strange to me.
My bark is wafted to the strand by breath divine;
And on the helm there rests a hand other than mine.

Two painters each painted a picture to illustrate his conception of rest. The first chose for his scene a still, lone lake among the far off mountains. The second threw on his canvas a thundering waterfall, with a fragile birch tree bending over the foam. At the fork of the branch, almost wet with the cataract's spray, a robin sat on its nest. Through such a trust, we may ourselves become princes of peace, reminders of Christ, even more than Solomon was in goodness, if not in greatness, resting ever in a peace that grows brighter as life's twilight and life's autumn come on, as is suggested by the following golden wedding song:

Spring has its south wind and the mellow earth,
The blooming bow and the flutter of the leaves,
And summer has its labor and its mirth,
But autumn binds the sheaves.

Dawn brings the gladness of awakening thought,
The quickened heart-throb and the will to roam:
Noon brings us nearer to the things we sought.
But twilight brings us home. —J. C. COLBURN.

"Yours must be a very responsible position," said a traveler to a switchman who had charge of the switches at a junction where five lines converge.

"Yes," was the reply, "but it is as nothing compared to yours as a Christian."

There is no greater responsibility in this world than that which Daniel Webster said was the greatest thought that ever passed through his brain, the thought of his "individual responsibility to God," which is the responsibility to make good in word and deed the name "Christian," that we bear as sharers in his kingdom.

One said of another, "He is a very good man, but he does not remind me of Jesus Christ." Of another it was s "He makes people fall in love with Jesus Christ."

One of the sweetest truths of the lesson is God's pr dential care of families, not only from day to day, but also f age to age. In the Ten Commandments heredity is said to carry its curse to the "t and fourth generation" of them that hate G but "mercy" is to extend to thousands of ge ations of them that love God, which is illustrated in that kings in the upper kingdom of Palestine were of seven dyn ties, while David's line in Judah continued to the end, and wi the "ten are lost tribes," the Jews are everywhere, and whom David called both "Son" and "Lord," is increasin ruling the world. And we may call him "brother," as of own household. "Pray God show me the way home for Je sake. Amen." This short prayer was breathed by a yo girl, as she stood in the middle of a Canadian wood, around her towered big pine trees and masses of rock. their base grew clumps of crimsoning bushes, for it was the fall, and the leaves were putting on their most vi coloring. It was this undergrowth which had proved so wildering to Bessie Newcome. She had pushed her w under and through them, without thinking how hard would find it to retrace her steps. Mother had sent her a other members of the family out that morning in search raspberries. Armed with pitchers and baskets, th had sallied forth full of fun and spirits, quite unheeding last words breathed by Mrs. Newcome: "Don't go beyo call of each other, dears! It is so easy to lose one self in woods just now. Keep all together, and there will be danger."

A Family Blest

Bessie had been the most heedless and adventurous of lot. In her search for the big yellow and crimson fruit, at last found herself "lost." No settler's child, under o nary circumstances, ever fails draw a bee-line homewards. Bessie had gone around the b of so many rocks, plunged throu so many copses, and run down many pine avenues, that she w quite bewildered, and so began pray. She had hardly said "Amen before she noticed a piece ch ped off the rock where she sto Her brother had blazed a pa and she quickly followed it hon Christ, our Brother King, h blazed for us a way of safety a peace. Every family, like that Joseph and Mary, like that David also, ought to be a "ho family," in which Jesus is a w come and abiding guest.

A Mohammedan Sheikh came the hospital in old Cairo for tre ment. "Do not speak to me of t Son of God," he exclaimed in ang adding many insulting epithets the holy name of Jesus. Whenev the Bible was read in the ward, the Gospel preached, he became abusive that the medical offic wondered whether he should be lowed to remain. But they hoped would listen and believe, and liv

"If you came to my village," sa he to the ladies, lifting himself in bed and looking angrily at the with his dark eyes. "If you can to my village and dared to speak the Son of God, all my people ar I would kill you with the sword Still Miss Sells persisted. She an the other ladies did not cease to te of Christ. Gradually he cea ed to reply, until, at last, he liste ed without a word to their lovin message of salvation through Christ. They could hardly b lieve it, but his heart was certainly softened and his interes awakened.

"Do you know that I saw the Sheikh with a Gospel in hi hand this morning, and he was reading it," remarked one these ladies in amazement. "Oh, I am so glad," replied th other. "I left it there, hoping he would take it up."

Hardly a day but he was seen with a Testament, intentl perusing the sacred pages. He spent many an hour in thi way. "This hospital was opened to extend the knowledg of Jesus Christ more even than to heal bodily disease," sai Miss Sells to him one day. "We consider the preaching o the Gospel the most important thing in the world."

"But what about those outside?" he quickly asked. "How can he hear? Who goes to them?" Miss Sells could onl offer up a prayer that the Sheikh might be a messenger o good news to "those outside." On the last Sunday he re mained in the hospital, he seemed so sad at leaving, tha Miss Sells was encouraged to put to him a very plain ques tion. "Sheikh," she said "do you believe Jesus to be th Son of God?" "How can I but believe, now that I have read the Book?" was his prompt reply. "But you did not believe when first you came into the hospital. You were like the Mohammedans outside who refuse to believe in Jesus." "Ah but I had not seen your Book then. They would also believe had they read that." He carried away a Testament with him to his far off village. Not long afterwards three men presented themselves at the hospital for treatment. "We want a book like the Sheikh had; we came from his village," said they, when the doctor had examined them. A week later came a fourth, in perfect health. "You are quite well, you do not need me," remarked the doctor. "No; I come for a book like the one Sheikh has," he replied. He was given the Sermon on the Mount, and slowly walked away down the road, reading as he went, toward the far-off village where the Sheikh was the messenger of good news, to "those outside."

A GREEK SOLDIER OF THE CROSS

The Romantic and Eventful Career of Captain Zuras, Now in this Country . . .

AMONG recent arrivals on our shores, is Captain C. S. Zuras, whose work in the island of Crete, in the Mediterranean, has been the means of extraordinary blessing to the people of that island, especially to the soldiers quartered there. One of the most remarkable results of his preaching was the conversion of fifty-seven Mohammedans, who have been baptized and are leading Christian lives, in spite of the odium that usually attaches to a Mohammedan who becomes a Christian. "They are good honest men," says Captain Zuras. "I write them every week and hear from them regularly, and they tell me that the good work is still going on."

Captain Zuras has labored also in Egypt under the auspices of the American mission in Cairo and there, too, trophies were won for Christ, chiefly from among the Greek population, to whom he could preach in their own tongue. He preaches in English, also, and never loses an opportunity of addressing British soldiers, who, he says, always listen attentively to the Gospel, and when converted, are stanch and true to their Lord. One regiment with which he labored was so permeated with the Gospel, and was so changed in spirit and in morals, that, when he parted from them, they held a meeting for farewell, at which they presented him with a testimonial, signed by more than a thousand men, testifying to the value his services had been, in leading the men from darkness to light. They gave him also a gold watch and chain, but these he is now unable to show. "The Lord's work," as Captain Zuras says, "needs money, and sometimes there are opportunities of doing it, when the funds are not at hand. The chain had to go. I should have liked to keep the watch as a memento; but the time came when money was needed to keep the good work going, so the watch went, too."

A singularly modest man is Captain Zuras, who can be induced to talk of his work only with difficulty. He shrinks with a reluctance by no means common from appealing for funds. "I cannot bear," he says, "to take up collections, or plead for money. That is wasting opportunity. I am working for souls. Let some man who has the gift raise the funds. I have not that gift. I can generally manage to earn my own living, wherever I am, for I do not mind hard work, and then when evening comes, I go out among the people and talk to them about Christ. It surprises me how little ordinary people know of him. But they will listen, and then they begin to inquire for themselves, and they are converted. I found it so in Africa and in England, and very much so in Crete. But the money! That is needed all the time. You can do so much good with it, if you have it. But I cannot spend my time in looking for that, when I can talk to people who need the Gospel." So like the great Apostle, he labors with his hands that he may be chargeable to no man. He has an ambition to build a Christian Church in Crete: and land for the purpose has already been given him by a sympathizer, and Captain Zuras has set aside from his own earnings the nucleus of a building fund, which he is sure will grow when people know the situation in Crete and see what has already been accomplished.

Captain Zuras is forty-seven years of age, and is a native of the island of Corfu. His has been a very eventful life, in strange lands and in varied service. His father was a revolutionary officer, now retired. Captain Zuras, in his early years, also led a company of insurgents, and has never lost the military bearing and comradeship with soldiers of any land. He has not lost, either, his love of freedom, and in the recent war between Turkey and Greece drew his sword in the Greek cause, though his main object in joining the army was to gain opportunities for preaching to his comrades.

In his early life while a student in the French schools, Captain Zuras was thrown much among infidels and imbibed sceptical doctrines. He even appeared on the infidel platform and delivered infidel addresses. To the Salvation Army, then led by Commissioner and Mrs. Ballington Booth, belongs the honor of having won the young atheist for Christ. He immediately joined the Army and took part in their work. "Of course, he says, "I was sent to prison for preaching. I was confined only a few days and then released. That is not the only time I have been in prison. It does not last long. They let me go when they find out that I am not preaching sedition, and I do not mind a day or two in prison occasionally, because it is in Christ's cause."

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY IN CRETE

The Salvation Army, believing that the brave young Christian might do better service if he had a Christian education, sent him to their Training Home in London, and he remained there for thirteen months, alternating study with street preaching. A member of the famous Crossley family happened on one occasion to be among his auditors and formed a plan for more extended work for him. He provided a Gospel van, with which Captain Zuras went long tours through England, preaching wherever audiences could be gathered. Rev. Charles Garrett, the President of the Wesleyan Conference, also took an interest in him, and sent him on a tour among the chapels of the denomination. He held Evangelistic meetings, and his clear views of Bible truth and his quaint, pungent comments on Bible texts were used not only for the conversion of sinners, but for the quickening of the Lord's people. Wherever he went, the news that "the Greek preacher" was to hold a meeting drew an eager and attentive audience. The religious papers of those days were enthusiastic in praise of his successful work. Thence he went to Greece to take part in the struggle with Turkey. His brother also was in the same army, and was killed in one of the battles. Preaching the simple Gospel on the march and around the campfires in the evening he was very successful. He found, as he says, that men who do not know whether they may not be killed in battle the next day, will listen to the Gospel of immortality, more eagerly than they would under other circumstances.

After the war, Captain Zuras went to Egypt. Under the auspices of the American Mission at Cairo, he labored among Greeks and Mohammedans. He bears strong testimony to the value of the mission. Few people, he says, know how much good it is doing. An opportunity occurred during his stay in Egypt, of laboring among the British soldiers, then about to start under Gen. Kitchener for Khartoum. He accompanied them on the march to that city, and was gladdened by the conversion of many of the men.

The attractions of his native land drew him strongly on his return to Cairo, and finally the way was opened for him to go to Crete, of which Prince George of Greece had become governor. He hired a small house and began to hold services. Noticing the antagonism of races and religions, he proposed to devote one evening in the week to the Turks. They were reluctant to come, but the cordiality of the invitation at last won them and ten men came. At the close of a simple exposition of the Gospel, one of them asked permission to speak. "I was born and brought up among Christians," he said, "but I never understood Christianity before. If this is the Gospel, it is sweeter than honey and more comforting than milk." He was urged to come again the next night and bring his friends. He accepted and the crowd he brought filled the house. Before that week was completed, fifty seven Mohammedans had been brought to Christ. The Greek Archbishop was amazed when he heard of it and was incredulous, but after talking with some of the converts, he burst into tears and thanked God. The change of spirit in the men led to some remarkable results. Men of different races were seen together in amicable converse, a spectacle that had not been witnessed before. Political and social measures of all kinds had been tried in vain to harmonize the heterogeneous elements, but what they had failed to do was accomplished by the Gospel.

Captain Zuras had joined the Christian Endeavor movement while in Cairo, and had found its united spirit and undenominational principles admirably adapted to his methods. He therefore introduced it to Crete, and was gratified by the success of the plan. A Union was formed that is now holding the workers together, and is a source of united encouragement. He would be glad if during his visit here he could address some Christian Endeavor societies and tell them the interesting story of the inauguration and progress of their movement among the soldiers and people in Crete. Letters sent to this office will be forwarded to him.

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Etiquette of Calls

I AM often asked by young people who are anxious to do just right, whether a lady should invite a man to call upon her, or whether he should ask her permission to call. In ordinary intercourse, this matter is not momentous. If two persons meet casually, find each other agreeable, and desire further acquaintance, they usually find a way of bringing about what they desire. According to strictly conventional rules, a gentleman should seek the acquaintance of the lady, and he may properly pay her the homage of asking if he may call on her, or he may suggest to a friend who knows her, that he would like to be taken to call. There are no insurmountable barriers in a country like ours, to prevent the pleasant social mingling of those who are naturally attracted. Nor, is there the slightest reason, why in most cases, a woman should not hesitate to say frankly, "I will be pleased to see you at my home if you have an evening free," or, "Mother will be glad to meet you, at any time," or "Mother and I are always happy to see our friends," or any other formula that is sincere and spontaneous.

Girls are learning the true value of mothers. In the more exclusive circles of society, mothers spread protecting wings over their unmarried daughters, till the latter have evidently and defiantly entered on the privileges of spinsterhood. A young woman who has reached the maturity that arrives with her thirtieth year, no longer needs the hovering pinion of maternal supervision at every step. Girls, however, are saved many embarrassments, and rescued from many predicaments, by treating their mothers with consideration, and putting them as a shield between themselves and any confusing situation. The days are over, I trust forever, when, on the announcement of a masculine caller; a callow youth or boy about as old as her own son, mother scuttles out of the parlor like a frightened hen, and leaves the entertainment and the field to her daughters. She may not wish to give up her entire evening to the boy or the man, but if she be well-bred, she greets him, and stays awhile, and retires in no disorder. Nor, while she remains, is her presence a handicap on the group. Her girls like mother to know their friends.

How late may a man linger when he calls, is another query solicitously propounded. Of course the length of a call depends somewhat on the familiarity of the caller in the family. An intimate friend will not trespass against any accepted code if he remain almost until the ordinary bedtime of the family. This time, as everyone knows, differs widely in different households. Ten o'clock is late for some. Others do not break the evening camp till almost midnight. But, broadly speaking, few callers should stay beyond half-past ten, and ten is the better hour for leave-taking in most instances. A first call should not be more than half an hour long. From eight to nine calls in town may properly begin. In country homes calling may begin and end an hour earlier than is feasible in town. Never protract a call after it grows wearisome. When conversation drags like a sleigh on bare ground, for pity's sake, arise and depart. Don't monopolize the conversation, you who receive, or you who call. Good talk is not a monologue. It must needs show fair play.

"Shall I relieve a man of his hat, his stick, his overcoat," inquires a young woman, whose earnest desire is to be courteous. Fashion says let a man look after his paraphernalia himself. The duty of a hostess does not oblige her to take any trouble in the matter. But here intervenes common sense. Should you happen to have a bashful visitor, or a near-sighted one, why not tell him that there is a table, a hat-rack, or some other convenient place where he may lay his outdoor things. The clever guest, accustomed to society, will need no such intimation, and the instinct of amiability is to assist the opposite one, whose shyness is making him wretched. There are men who cling desperately to their hats and canes, as if should they let them go, they would be unarmed in a hostile country. By all means let them possess their souls, and their hats too, in peace. In the case of an aged or infirm visitor, rules are laid aside. Such an one is to be cared for and aided in every way. "Nice customs curtsey to great kings," and before age and weakness politeness bows the knee. Indeed, the foundation stone underlying the social edifice and holding it up is kindness, and hard by that is another stone called common sense. If you build your good manners on these you will not be found wanting, even in a court.

"May the hostess terminate a call?" Certainly not, unless she has some excellent reason for doing so, as illness in the family, a child with the croup, a husband with rheumatism, a hungry man waiting for a supper, and the maid out on her evening off. Ordinarily, the hostess sits, attentive and interested, until her visitor rises to go. She also rises and goes with him to the door. Town etiquette dictates leave-taking at the door of the drawing-room. Old-fashioned people, of whom I am one, go to the house-door, and say good-by to a guest there. Politeness does not require dribbles of talk on the door-sill, nor any prolonged farewell, with the wind blowing in the face of the hostess. She need not invite pneumonia and influenza through such folly as this.

"I hate," says pretty Mabel, "to introduce people." My dear child, why? It's the simplest thing on earth You mention names very clearly, you present the younger person to the older, the gentleman to the lady. Do it once or twice and your dread will vanish. It's the same about offering refreshments, which Almira loathes. From the earliest antiquity, hospitality has been illustrated by the offered cup, and the offered loaf. A man or woman who is your friend is never wholly yours till he or she has broken bread beneath your roof. There is never any difficulty if you have light refreshments suitable to the hour, if you proffer them without nervousness, and, if only you contrive a table or a stand whereon a guest may rest a glass, or a teacup, or a plate. To hold these things in the hand is not always convenient.

About visiting cards, remember, that a card left at a door, counts as a call. Don't waste your cards. It is not necessary, except very occasionally, to leave a card for every member of a household. In the matter of visiting cards use common sense.

GOING TO THE MARKET

Poor, patient sheep, that meekly follow,
Nor dream how soon your day must end!
That trudge along o'er hill and hollow,
I would your fortunes I might mend.
Poor patient creatures, meek and fearing nought,
Patience, I'll learn, for patience you have taught.

Ripe Corn

Sun, and wind, and grace of heaven
To the ribboned corn have given
Stately height and sweetened grain;
Waving grandly o'er the plain,
Unto all who pass that way
Look on us, the corn-hosts say.
Bannered in the autumn breeze,
Tossing, rippling like the seas,
Here is bread for man and beast,
For the greatest, for the least,
Here we stand, a nation's food,
God hath blessed us, we are good.
So the stately corn may say,
Unto all who pass this way.

NAOMI KEARD.

An Old-Fashioned Grace

HAVE you ever noticed how much praise the Bi bestows upon humility? In one book or anoth historical, prophetical, evangelical, apostolical, t Bible strikes the same note. Pride goeth before destru tion, a haughty spirit before a fall. Arrogance and vani shall be bowed down in abasemen Before honor is humility. T Sermon on the Mount is o Lord's premium on meekne gentleness, non-resistance; on t exercise not of the warlike but the passive and peaceful virtu of men. Christ cautioned us take the lowest room at feasts; he were here to-day, his teachi would cut straight through o foolish pride of caste and ra and place. Pomp of wealth, pom of circumstance, pomp of aml tion, what cared for them, the Sc of the Virgin, who spent his you manhood in the shop of the ca penter, who began his earthly mi istry certified by a voice fro heaven, as the Son of God. any of us are anxious to live th true Christ-life on this planet, v must begin by studying humilit

Not humility always of monast vow or badge, or dress, or assum tion of poverty. The beggar monks of St. Francis may ha cherished in their hearts a subt pride in their own austerity. S may the Hindu devotee, mortif ing his flesh by dirt and hunge be proud and arrogant beneat his wretchedness. The humilit of which God approves is like th of Jesus, who humbled himsel "emptied" himself, and took o him the form of a servant, wh was in fashion as a man, thoug Lord of all.

An old-fashioned grace, this humility, but one worth cultiva ing by Christian people.

Preferring One Another

All the world despises Uria Heep. Servility and obsequiou The reason is that they counterfe humility, and are to that benign virtue as base coin t pure gold. The greatest men have ever been the humbles Wellington, Washington, Grant, Lincoln, Lee, Jackso McKinley, were men who claimed nothing for themselve who were too busy with their work to care for pomp an splendor, who gave due honor to their fellows. Our blesse Lord when he took upon him our flesh, emptied himself an became of no reputation. He washed the feet of the disc ples. He said: "I am among you as he that serveth." An thus doing, he crowned humility with fadeless glory, and s it up among the shining stars. In honor preferring one an other, is a good working motto for every-day life.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

CHAPTER VI.—Continued

AFTER some fashion, therefore, the paper was still being printed, and so far Douglas had avoided, what had been his college terror, a debt. George grumbled at that old press, which he said was nothing but a pile of old scrap iron, held together with gum, but neither he nor Quits had lost their faith in the final success of the Beacon, or its ability to "scoop" the Sentinel on news, advertisements, or editorials.

Douglas, sitting down with the chapter Esther had written, read it over carefully, making a few notes as he read. Then he got up and walked up and down a few minutes. He came back to the desk, picked up a pen and began to write.

It was his first experience at story writing and he was surprised to find how easy it was for him after once beginning. He wrote on until after midnight. When he read it over out loud, he grew a little doubtful, but attributed it to the reaction following his excitement over his first literary adventure.

The next evening he wrote a little more, and for the next few weeks he made slow progress on the chapter, and it was the last week in May before he finished the story and took the completed chapter to Mr. Edwards to read it over to Esther. After getting to the house, however, he suggested that they wait until the picnic came off before he read his part.

"O, we can't wait until then," Mr. Edwards exclaimed. "That isn't fair. We've heard Esther's chapter and have agreed that it's all right. But we don't know anything about yours. How do we know what you are going to give us?"

"You don't, and the more I think it over, the more I believe I'll not read my chapter to any one until the day of the picnic."

"I'm satisfied with that," Esther said. She had the least curiosity, Mr. Edwards said, of any woman he ever knew.

"O, if you're satisfied, that ends it with Douglas, of course," Mr. Edwards growled. "My feelings or those of Mrs. Edwards are not to be considered."

"I'll read it if you say so." Douglas turned laughing to Mrs. Edwards.

"No, I am willing to wait. It will make it more interesting to us if we don't know it all beforehand."

Mr. Sage came into the office two weeks later.

"I've fixed the date July 14. I'm expecting a big crowd. They're all talking about it. I've come in to-day to get some lumber. I'm going to build a platform for the speakers and have seats all through the grove. How about that story?"

Douglas told him it was all finished, and was the best they could do.

"Good! What's your idea about the reading of it?"

"Oh, I don't know. What's yours? You suggested before that two pretty girls read it, each taking a chapter."

"Well, what's the matter with the school ma'am reading her own chapter? Isn't she as pretty as any girl in Payson township?"

"I think she is," replied Douglas.

"And what's the reason you can't read your own chapter after the lunch? You can spell out your own writing better than anybody else. And besides, the people will take to that. They'd rather hear the authors read their own production."

Douglas consented to this for Esther and himself, and Mr. Sage went out highly pleased over the prospect of a very drawing card for the first Temperance Picnic in Payson township.

As the date drew near, Douglas made his plans to close up the office, and invited Quits and George to go with the party.

"You've not had any vacation for some time. We'll close up everything, and go out there and have a good time."

"Does Mr. Sage give anybody but them Sunday School kids a dish of ice-cream, Mr. Douglas?"

"We'll manage to get a dish for you, George. I'll give you mine. And Quits never eats ice-cream. There's two dishes for you."

"I just as soon have pie," George smiled, and covered up the old press, and began scrubbing up with what looked like a cake of tar and a piece of brick.

"IN THE THREE-SEATED RIG, EVERYBODY WAS IN THE BEST OF SPIRITS"

Mr. Edwards had hired a double team and a three-seated wagon, so Quits and George went along with the party. Mr. Vernon and his wife drove over in their buggy, and there were two loads of local politicians who went along, thinking the new picnic might be a fine opportunity to practice mixing with the people.

It was a most enjoyable day for a drive, and everybody in the three-seated rig seemed to be in the best of spirits. Mr. Edwards drove, and Mrs. Edwards insisted on sitting with the driver. Quits and George occupied the middle seat, and Esther and Douglas promised to behave like good children on the third.

About half way on the road Mr. Edwards reached under his seat and pulled out a basket. He lifted it over to Quits and George, winking at the company, and saying,

"I always get fearfully hungry at a picnic, so I brought along a little extra lunch just to keep us from fainting away. Sometimes at a picnic, I've noticed the boys don't get their share."

He winked at George to open the basket. He did so, and disclosed to view six tempting looking fresh baked apple pies.

"Why, James Edwards!" exclaimed his wife. "Those are the pies I baked for the Ladies' Aid supper, which comes off to-morrow night!"

"I'm real sorry," Mr. Edwards pretended to show great regret. "They were not labeled, and you did not tell me about it. Don't cry, Julia, that's a good little girl. I'll bake some more in the morning."

"Did you ever see such a man?" Mrs. Edwards laughed until she cried, while even the serious Quits could not hold out against the example she set them. It is also recorded that one boy at least among all those who attended that famous first picnic in Sage's grove, had all the pie he wanted that day.

Sage's grove was a sight to be remembered. Long before ten o'clock there were hundreds of teams on the ground, and the seats in front of the speaker's stand were filling up rapidly. There were hundreds of boys and girls, and the young women for the most part were dressed in white, and with touches of ribbon at hat and waist, gave agreeable and lively color to the cool green of the grove. Hay racks brought in large loads of Sunday School classes, laughing and singing. The farmers unhitched their horses, tied them to the trees, and stood about in rapidly increasing groups, waiting for the programme of the morning to begin. The women busied themselves finding convenient places for the spreading of the lunch, and large baskets and bundles were taken out of the wagons and deposited near the patches of table cloth that checked the ground.

On the sides close to the seats, half a dozen pedlers, with Mr. Sage's permission, had pitched booths for the sale of lemonade, peanuts, ice-cream, candy and popcorn.

Mr. Sage was all over the grounds at once, apparently, and the party from Colby had not been in the grove five minutes, before he found them and gave them a hearty greeting.

"It's a success already, Sage," said Edwards, as he unharnessed the horses, and with the help of the others arranged the wagon cushions around the places selected for the lunch.

"I think it is," Mr. Sage replied. "There must be as many as 4,000 people here already. That's more than you got out to church, Mr. Vernon." He spoke to the minister who just then came up.

"It's a fine opportunity, Mr. Sage. But do you think they'll gather on the seats and remain during your programme?"

"Will they? Wait until the singing begins. I must start the thing off soon in a few minutes. You understand about the programme? I sent you one. Singing and recitations from ten to eleven. Then Mr. Edwards gives a fifteen minutes' talk. Then Miss Harris reads her chapter; after that, lunch; at two o'clock some more singing, and recitations; at three, Mr. Douglas reads his chapter; then Mr. Vernon makes his talk, and we finish with 'America.' Next year I'm going to have an evening session, but we're not ready for that this time. Go right up on the platform, I've reserved seats for all the performers up there."

Mr. Sage was off to get the singers rounded up, and the Colby visitors went upon the platform and took the seats reserved for them, close by the Sunday School chorus.

"As one of the 'performers,' do you feel nervous, Esther," asked Douglas, as they sat down and looked with great interest at the crowd streaming towards the seats.

"No, I don't know that I do," Esther laughed a little. "I am a little doubtful though, about making the people hear. I have never talked out doors, and doesn't it seem a little absurd to you to shout out a story to an audience?"

"Don't try too hard. Just speak slowly and clearly. Talk straight ahead and don't turn from one side to the other. You have a beautiful voice. I don't have any trouble in hearing it."

"Don't you?" Esther smiled. She had never appeared to better advantage, and Douglas felt proud of her as he sat there beside her, more tempted to glance at her wide awake, resolute, earnest face than to watch the great crowd that began to pack all the rising bank of seats in front of him.

And it was an inspiring scene to the dullest person there. As the first Sunday School chorus rose to sing the audience applauded vigorously. The children's sweet voices rang out with glad abandon; and when they finished there was loud call for another. Mr. Sage made a little speech, saying it was going to be the rule to have no encores on account of the number of 'performances' on the programme. So with admirable promptness the singing and recitations went forward, and the rival Sunday Schools cheered their own members in turn. When at the close of that part of the programme, Mr. Edwards came forward to make his little talk, everybody was stirred up to a pitch of earnest enthusiasm.

Douglas and Mr. Vernon were surprised at Mr. Edwards' talk. He surprised himself, and as Mr. Sage remarked, 'put up a mighty good article.' The only thing that seemed to embarrass him was the absence of anything to stand on. There was a small table on the platform with a pitcher of ice water on it; but Mrs. Edwards, who knows her husband's habits, very thoughtfully whispered to Mr. Sage to put the pitcher

C. G. L., Chicago, Ill. 1. Should a Christian who has been lied about or slandered, by a person of low character, do all in his power to convince the world, as well as the church, of his honesty, by written as well as verbal proofs? 2. Also knowing mean and debasing things of said person, should a Christian make it known for his own defence, so that others may lose faith in the accuser?

1. Yes, if you have the means of vindicating your character from attack, you are justified in using them. 2. No, you cannot as a Christian, consistently attack another person. The fact that you are able to refute his charges against yourself, will be sufficient to discredit him, in the event of his attacking others. The world's way would be to crush him, but it is not the Christian's way.

Laura D., Binghamton, N. Y. 1. Where can I find the complete quotation which begins: "God made bees and bees made honey?" 2. Who is the author?

1. The verse complete is:

"God made bees and bees made honey;
God made man and man made money;
Pride made the devil and the devil made sin,
And God made a big pit and put the devil in."

2. The lines were written by a poor English coal miner upon the fly-leaf of his Bible, and were transcribed by Rev. J. Henry Dixon many years ago.

Injured, St. Louis, Mo. Is it not the duty of a Christian brother who has injured me to come to me and ask pardon, or at least, to seek reconciliation?

Yes, it is his duty; but it may never be done. Too often it happens that he who has done the wrong cannot forgive. He cherishes resentment and dislikes the man whom he has injured. Better seek him out and effect a reconciliation yourself. You can do so more easily than he, because you are not hampered by a guilty conscience. Try going to him, and without reproaching him tell him you want to be reconciled. Both of you will feel better, and the other one is more likely to confess his fault than if you hold aloof.

If we may judge from the tenor of many of the letters that come to us weekly, a very large number of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers are studying the "Home Music" lessons. Mrs. N. P., a clergyman's wife, of Los Angeles, Calif., writes:

Prof. Unseld's lessons are lucid and in every way helpful. I am endeavoring to give instruction in sight singing to a class of missionary workers, preparing for work in foreign fields, who are unable to pay for more competent instruction. I have had vocal training for years and am a teacher of piano and organ, but never knew just how to go about giving these class lessons in a clear, forceful and correct way. These lessons will furnish the needed help.

C. W. E., Ballston Spa, N. Y. How do you account for the fact that so few are being saved? Has the Gospel lost its power? Or, is it not preached?

No, the Gospel has lost none of its force. Wherever it is preached it is now, as always, a "power unto salvation." Multitudes have been drawn to Christ through the tent evangelistic work in many of our leading cities this summer. What is most greatly needed now is a thorough awakening in the churches, and the dropping of all that diverts them from the plain and urgent duty of Gospel presentation.

J. S., Springfield, Ill. Did not our Saviour's divine nature give him all the education necessary for him? Would there be any need of schools, or teaching in his case?

We should think it probable that he went to school like other boys. In coming into the world he "humbled," or as it is sometimes rendered, "emptied" himself and was made like unto his brethren. He took upon himself our nature with its infirmities and limitations that he might be able to sympathize with men. You remember that he was wearied with a journey (John 4:6). You cannot imagine divinity being weary; but divinity in human form could be and was weary. He was hungry and thought he might find figs on a certain tree (Mark 11:13), but when he came to it there were no figs on it. Divinity could not be hungry and could not be mistaken, but the divinity in him was of the spirit and disposition not of the physical order. It is therefore most probable that he had to study and to learn to read and write in the same way as other boys. When they said of him, How knoweth this man letters having never learned? they simply meant that he had not had the education of a scribe, which in those times was supposed to be necessary to a public teacher?

Mrs. A. W., Tarrytown, N. Y. Will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD kindly inform a subscriber where copies of the same may be bound?

If you have the number for a year complete, you can have them bound by some bookbinder in your own town. We can supply bound volumes at $2.50.

Subscriber, Atlanta, Ga. 1. Was the writer of the Epistle of James the brother of the Apostle, John? 2. Was the Gospel of Mark written by John Mark about whom Paul and Barnabas quarreled?

1. Nothing is positively known about the authorship of the Epistle, but a close study of it leads to the opinion that it is more likely to have been written by a brother of our Lord, named James. Paul mentions him (see Gal. 1:19). All that we know of his character renders it likely that he, rather than John's brother, would have written such an Epistle. 2. It has always been supposed that the Mark who wrote the Gospel was John Mark, but there is the same uncertainty as in the case of the Epistle. It is believed that it was Peter from whom he obtained the facts and that Peter superintended the writing of this Gospel.

Subscriber, Detroit, Mich. Will you please tell me where to find the expressions: "Prone to evil," and "May you have many souls for your hire?"

The exact language quoted does not occur in the Bible, but its equivalent, or the passages upon which the phrases are based may be found in Jer. 4:22, and 13:23; Prov. 11:30, and Daniel 12:3.

R. J. Creswell, Minneapolis, writes:

In your issue of August 26, occurs this statement: "In North Dakota, Wisconsin and Minnesota a hot battle between liquor and temperance is progressing." From this and similar statements in great Eastern journals, it appears that the East does not know that prohibition reigns in the State of North Dakota. When that Territory became a State in 1889, it incorporated prohibition into its constitution, by a special vote of the people. It still stands thus in spite of persistent efforts for its repeal. The law has been strengthened at different times at certain points, and is to-day securely entrenched in the hearts of its citizens. Thousands of voters in North Dakota have never seen an open saloon. North Dakota ranks with Maine as a prohibition State.

Inquirer, Worcester, Mass. 1. How many American missionaries are there in foreign lands? 2. What denomination has the largest number? 3. How many European missionaries are there now employed in heathen lands?

1. We have no later figures than were given out at the beginning of this year, but it is not likely that there have been many changes. According to those, there were 4,010 American missionaries in the field—1,590 men, and 2,420 women. 2. The Presbyterian has the largest number—306 men, and 443 women. 3. The total number working under the auspices of European societies, is given at 6,075—2,811 men, and 3,264 women.

II. Kings chapter 19, and Isaiah chapter 37 are identical.

A. B., Espeyville, Pa. Will a regenerated man deliberately plan a crime and execute it? Was David a regenerated man when he planned the death of Uriah?

Even regenerated men may fall into sin. They seem at times to lose command of themselves, to wander from God's protecting care and do wickedness. It seems to them beforehand, as if such iniquity would be impossible to them, as in the case of Peter, who before his denial of Christ, declared that he would die with him rather than deny him. After the deed, they deplore it and loat themselves for their wickedness. Read t fifty-first Psalm, which David wrote after t murder of Uriah, and you will see how a go man feels after his fall. "Cast me not aw from thy presence," he says; "take not t Holy Spirit from me;" "restore unto me t joy of thy salvation." Those are not the e pressions of a wicked man, but of a good m who had had the joy of salvation. He bitt ly repented and was severely punished; b you cannot suppose that a man after Go own heart (see I. Samuel 13:14) was not a generated man.

INDIAN RIVER, FLORIDA, SWEPT BY THE RECENT CYCLONE

September has been a month of phenomenal weather. Early in the month a cyclone, originating in the Gulf of Mexico, swept the West Indies and the Florida peninsula, doing widespread damage to buildings and growing crops, and causing considerable loss of life. Florida was the heaviest sufferer, the loss on hotels, dwellings, farms and plantations being little short of a million dollars. Almost simultaneously with the cyclonic visitation in the South, snowstorms and heavy rains occurred in the Northwest, also doing great damage. The Eastern States, too, had an exciting experience with an Atlantic hurricane which swept the New York, New Jersey and Connecticut seaboard on September 16, causing widespread damage to buildings and shipping. Several sailing vessels foundered in the Atlantic gale, and a number of New York fishing-boats were disabled or sunk, and some of their crews perished. The sidewalks of New York were strewn with the wreckage of plate-glass windows. Hundreds of trees were uprooted, several church steeples were blown down, and many small vessels foundered in the bays and rivers.

Boyhood Days of Famous Divines

No. V.—ADONIRAM JUDSON

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

DONIRAM JUDSON, who was destined to be one of the greatest missionaries the world has ever known, was born in Malden, Mass., August 9, 1788. His father was a Baptist preacher, and the little boy was surrounded by the strongest Christian influences from his earliest remembrance. He was undoubtedly very precocious. His mother taught him to read when he was but three years old. His father had gone from home on a short journey, and she, desiring to surprise her husband, took the opportunity to teach the child during his absence. He learned so rapidly that he was able to read his father a chapter of the Bible on his return.

Being a preacher's son, little Adoniram naturally heard a good deal of preaching, and often he was only four years of age, he used to collect the children of the neighborhood about him, and, standing in a chair, would go through the form of a sermon with great gravity and earnestness, winning much admiration from the other children. In later years, his parents often recounted this story, and never forgot the hymn put forth by the baby preacher, "I preach my Gospel, saith the Lord."

WHEN Adoniram was about seven years old he became very much interested in being told that the earth is round, and that it revolves around the sun. It became a serious question in his mind, whether or not the sun actually moved. Instead of asking either his father or mother about it, he set about discovering for himself the truth. His little brother, who was the only one he talked with about it, said the sun did move, for she could see it; but he had learned that he could not always trust his senses, and so he told her that he was going to make sure. Soon after noon, he was one day missed about noon; and when no one had seen him for several hours, his mother became uneasy, and went in search of him. He was found in a field at some distance from the house, stretched on his back; and that, with a circular hole cut in the crown, was over his face, and his swollen eyes almost shielded with the intense light and heat. He told his father that he was looking at the sun; and he assured his sister that he had solved the problem with regard to the sun's moving, though she was never able to comprehend the process by which he arrived at the result.

ADONIRAM was famous among all the boys and girls in town for being uncommonly skilled in guessing charades and solving enigmas, and a boy's pocket never carried a greater variety of toys and trading property than Adoniram's head had of assorted oddities for the other young folks to guess at. He was always on hand with something to puzzle the rest, and never so happy as when he had give them a nut they could not crack. On one occasion, he found in a newspaper an enigma rather boastfully set forth, and the editor challenged any reader to make a solution. He felt very sure that he had guessed riddles as hard as that, and gave himself no rest until he had found a satisfactory answer. He copied his answer to the puzzle out in as large a hand as possible, addressed it to the editor, and with no confidant but his sister, carried it to the post-office. But the postmaster supposed it to be some mischievous work of the minister's son, and exercising his arbitrary power, and more than ordinary wisdom so often assumed by the village postmaster, he placed the letter in the hands of the father. The poor boy's surprise and embarrassment may be imagined when he saw it lying on the table after tea.

"Is that yours, Adoniram?"

"Yes, sir,"

"How came you to write it?" Silence.

"What is it about?"

"Please read it, father."

"I do not read other people's letters. Break the seal, and read it yourself."

Adoniram broke the seal, and mumbled over the contents, then placed the letter in his father's hand. The father read it, called for the newspaper which had suggested it, and after reading and re-reading both, laid them on the table, crossed his hands on his knees, and looked intently into the fire. All this time Adoniram was on the anxious seat. He stood silently watching his father, balancing in his mind the chances of his being treated as a culprit, or, praised for his good success at the enigma. But he was not to know.

When the father awoke from his revery, he changed the subject of conversation, and the letter was never heard of afterwards. The next morning, Adoniram's father gravely informed him that he had purchased for his son a book of riddles, a very common one; and as soon as he had solved all that it contained, he should have more difficult books. "You are a very acute boy, Adoniram," he added, patting him on the head with unusual affection? "and I expect you to become a great man."

ADONIRAM was wild with joy at the idea of having a whole bookful of riddles, and carried it away, determined to master every one. But he was soon much surprised, and not a little disappointed to find that it was a copy of the arithmetic which the larger boys in his school were studying. But the memory of his father's praise, and the reflection that if there was anything puzzling in the arithmetic, he was sure he should like it, caused him to devote himself to it with energy. He stuck to his purpose so faithfully that before he had reached his tenth year, he became quite noted for his good scholarship, and especially for his ability to solve arithmetical problems.

So noted did he become, even at this early age, that a gentleman residing in the neighboring town of Beverly sent him a problem, with the offer of a dollar for the solution. Adoniram immediately shut himself in his chamber. The reward was tempting; but, what was still more important to the proud ambitious boy, he felt that his reputation was at stake. On the morning of the second day he was called from his seclusion to amuse his little brother, who was ill. He went very reluctantly, but said nothing, for family government was of a kind in the Judson family that permitted no talking back on the part of the children. In order to amuse his brother he undertook to build a cob house. He laid an unusually strong foundation with a great deal of hesitation and slowness, and was very deliberate in building up the walls, when suddenly he shouted, "That's it. I've got it!" and sending the materials for the half-built house rolling about the room he hurried off, baby or no baby, to write down the result. The problem was solved, he had won his dollar, and saved his reputation.

AT THE AGE of ten, Adoniram was sent to Captain Morton to take lessons in navigation, where he acquitted himself well. In the grammar school he was noted for his proficiency in Greek. His schoolmates nicknamed him "Virgil," not only on account of his studious habits, but because of the odd style of his hat, which they said was one "Old Virgil dug up." There were almost no books for children in those days, and so as his mind was thirsty for reading, he read the books of theology in his father's library and the novels of Richardson and Fielding, or the plays of Ben Johnson which he was able to borrow in the neighborhood.

Before Adoniram was twelve years of age, he had heard visitors of his father's talk a great deal of a new Exposition of the Apowalypse, which they pronounced a work of rare interest. Up to this time, the Revelation had been the book that, of all others in the Bible, the boy delighted most to read; and he had searched the few commentaries his father owned without getting much light upon its mysteries. The new book was possessed by a very awe-inspiring man in the neighborhood; but Adoniram felt that he must have it, and at last he worked his courage up to the point of knocking at this man's door and begging the loan of it. He was coldly and sternly refused. His grief and mortification were so deep that he went to his father about it. He received more sympathy than he expected. "Not lend it to you!" he said indignantly, "I wish he could understand it half as well. You shall have books, Adoniram, just as many as you can read, and I shall go to Boston myself for them."

Many Cannibals Converted

FROM the Rev. J. G. Paton, the famous missionary to the New Hebrides, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following very interesting letter, stating the progress of Gospel work among the heathen tribes of the South Pacific:

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Let me thank you cordially, and the giver of the $10 you have so kindly sent me for the work of our New Hebrides Mission.

You will be pleased to hear that our Lord's work prospers at all our mission stations, and at some of them it is now having great success in the conversions of many of the cannibals to the worship of our God, and to joining the Christian party in trying to love and serve Jesus, and in the increased zeal of many of our converts and Christian native teachers, in trying to lead all within their reach to renounce idolatry and accept and enjoy the blessings of the Gospel. In their evangelizing work every now and again, one or more are shot by the rifle of the savage, or fall under his club, yet they persevere in the hope of leading many to Jesus. If white Christians were as earnest and zealous in our Lord's work as our converts are, what grand results we might have! If some who say they think the heathen are better without the Gospel were landed for a week on one of our heathen islands, and then saw the converts in their Christian villages, and what an unspeakable blessing the Gospel is to them all for this world, and how it enables them to die rejoicing in salvation, they would see that the Gospel is an elevating life-giving power to all who love and serve Jesus Christ.

Castile soap is supposed to be made of olive oil, hence its presumed purity. Some Castile soap is made of olive oil and some is not. Some Castile soap is good and some is bad. In purchasing you can not tell which kind you are getting.

In buying Ivory Soap you are always getting a vegetable oil soap of known purity. It is also more attractive in form, lathers more freely and is therefore more convenient to use.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON VI.

Signatures.—In preceding lessons we learned that any pitch—C, D, E, F, etc.—may be taken for Do. The terms "Key C," "Key F," and so on, mean that the pitch designated by those letters, or others, as the case may be, is to be taken as the tone Do. The correct pitch indicated for Do may be obtained from the piano or any musical instrument. For the exercises in this course, the solitary pupil who may not have recourse to an instrument, may take any pitch that is easy for his or her voice.

We also learned that any degree of the staff may be taken to represent Do. We learned that with the treble clef on the staff Do is represented by the added line below; with the base clef on the staff Do is on the second space.

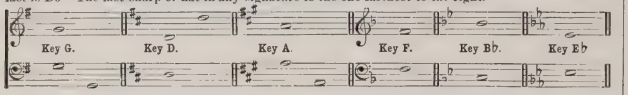
10. The staff with either clef alone represents the Key of C. The other keys are represented by the addition of one or more sharps or flats. The characters (clefs, sharps, flats) that make the staff represent a key are called the Signature—Key-Sign.

11. The place of Do for the different keys is indicated by a signature consisting of a clef, or a clef and one or more sharps or flats.

The six signatures in the following table, together with the signature of the Key of C, give the seven positions that Do may have with each clef:

Key G. Signature, one sharp. Do, second line treble staff; fourth space or first line base staff.
Key D. Signature, two sharps. Do, space below and fourth line treble staff; third line base staff.
Key A. Signature, three sharps. Do, second space treble staff; fifth line or first space base staff.
Key F. Signature, one flat. Do, first space treble staff; fourth line base staff.
Key B-flat. Signature, two flats. Do, third line treble staff; second line base staff.
Key E-flat. Signature, three flats. Do, first line treble staff; third space base staff.

Rule for finding Do.—In sharp signatures the last sharp is Ti. Do is on the next degree above. In flat signatures the last flat is Fa. Do is four degrees below or five above; or, the flat next to the last is Do The last sharp or flat in any signature is the one farthest to the right.



In addition to the above signatures, there are three others to be learned, but they offer no further difficulties in reading. With the signature of five flats, key of D-flat, the syllables are read exactly as they are with the signature of two sharps, key D. The key of A-flat, four flats, reads the same as key A, three sharps. Key E, four sharps, and key E-flat, three flats, read alike. The signatures of five sharps, six sharps and six flats are seldom used in ordinary vocal music.

Our first use of the clefs and all signatures is simply to indicate the place of Do on the staff. Never mind how much more there is to be learned about the clefs and signatures, this is all you need to know about them just now.

Ex. 29. This exercise is intended for practice in recognizing signatures. Pointing to the examples in random order, name the clef, the signature, the key and the place of Do. Thus in the second signature the naming would be: "Base clef, two sharps, key D, Do on the third line."

For further practice of this sort, take any book of church or Sunday school tunes and name the signatures as you turn page after page.

The Medium Accent.—As a preparation for the next step you should review what was taught in the preceding lesson concerning accent and measures.

12.—In addition to the two primary degrees of accent—strong and weak—there is a secondary or medium accent.

13.—By means of the medium accent, groups of twos are united into groups of fours, and groups of threes into groups of sixes.

Illustration.—The medium accent unites two two-pulse measures into a four-pulse measure, and two three-pulse measures into a six-pulse measure. Set your metronome swinging (not too slowly at first) and practice tapping and singing groups of twos alternately with groups of fours as indicated in Example 30. Then take similar practice with threes and sixes as indicated in Example 31.

Ex. 30.
Two-pulse.— | TAA taa | TAA taa | TAA taa | TAA taa ‖
Four-pulse.— | TAA taa taa taa | TAA taa taa taa ‖

Ex. 31.
Three-pulse.— | TAA taa taa | TAA taa taa | TAA taa taa | TAA taa taa ‖
Six-pulse.— | TAA taa taa taa taa taa | TAA taa taa taa taa taa ‖

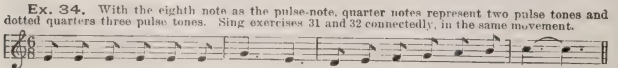
Counting and beating time in four-pulse and six-pulse measures may also be practiced. The counts in four-pulse measure are one, two, three, four; the motions, down, left, right, up; in six-pulse measure, one, two, three, four, five, six, and down, left, left, right, up, up.

The measure-sign for four-pulse measure, quarter note to the pulse is 4/4 (four-four); 6/4 (six-four) indicates six-pulse measure, quarter note to the pulse. Six-pulse measure is most commonly represented with the eighth note as the pulse note, the measure sign being 6/8 (six-eight). When the rate of movement is rapid, it is usual to make but two beats to the measure, each beat including three pulses.

Ex. 32. With the quarter note to the pulse a whole note represents a tone four pulses long.

Ex. 33. With slow movement at first, six beats to the measure; then with faster pulses, three to the beat, two beats to the measure. Practice the next exercise in the same way.

Ex. 34. With the eighth note as the pulse-note, quarter notes represent two pulse tones and dotted quarters three pulse tones. Sing exercises 31 and 32 connectedly, in the same movement.



You now have a wide field from which to select music for practice. Look through your singing-school book for exercises and tunes in the various keys and the four kinds of measure you have thus far learned. You can find many tunes in your church tune-book that are within your present ability.

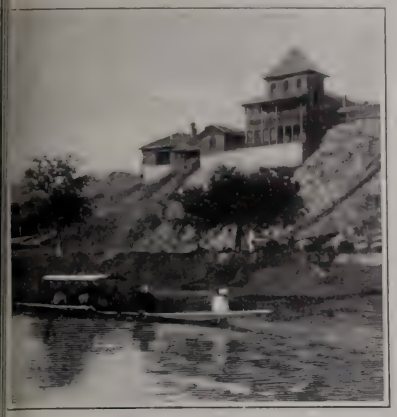
IN THE VALE OF KASHMERE

THIS lovely valley, wherein is situated the somewhat unique and most picturesque town of Srinagar, presents many features of interest to the traveler from the Western hemisphere. It is watered by the river Jhelum, upon whose bosom floats the house-boat—in most cases—the home of the summer visitor from the scorched and dusty plains of the Punjab. Here, too, eternally covered with snow; to the west, a beautiful rolling country, well watered, a distant peep of the Liddar and Sind valleys; and below us the irregular and thickly-settled town of Srinagar, with its seven quaint bridges spanning the river. The Oriental building, with its Hindu temple, walled gardens, and enclosed zenana, all appertaining to the Maharaja; the rickety houses perched in impossible places; the bazaars, with their queer and ragged population; the tumbledown Mohammedan mosques; in short, the strange sights and sounds of a Kashmeri town, which seem so unreal to Western eyes. Dirt and squalor are everywhere apparent, but in spite of his poverty, the Kashmeri goes about in his picturesque rags and with a too-often empty stomach — in the cheerful manner peculiar to his race. He believes in the evil eye and in witchcraft. His wife is a miserable, downtrodden specimen of humanity; his children are neglected, but they are a "happy-go-lucky" kind and take no care for the morrow.



A SCENE IN PICTURESQUE SRINAGAR

Under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society Drs. Arthur and Earnest Neve, with their niece, Miss Neve, and an assistant in the nursing department, have established a hospital to afford medical aid to these poor natives. It is conducted in the most approved and up-to-date manner. It is very touching to see the old, infirm, and blind leaning on their sticks, all believing so implicitly in the "doctor Sahib," who is ever ready to help them. Those having no homes are taken in, the lepers being isolated, eleven miles away on a mountain side, overlooking the beautiful Dahl Lake. Within the hospital grounds is a chapel, in which midday and Sunday services are held in the vernacular, about 140 native Christians attending on the Sabbath.

In spite of the prejudice, ignorance and superstition, Hindoo, Mohammedan, and Christian alike unite in unqualified praise of this noble band of workers who, in the spirit of Christ, have labored for more than sixteen years in this work for the sick and helpless; their reward being the words of the Master: "As ye have done it unto one of the least of these little ones, ye have done it unto Me."

is the native dunga, a most useful conveyance, for the merchant of Kashmere, who with his portable stock of exquisitively carved silverware, embroideries, woodcarving, so-called precious stones from Ladakh and Lhassa, skins of snow leopards, red and black bears, panthers, etc., dwells with his family in the stern of this Noah's Ark, together with fowls and other live stock, here, too, swings the cooking pot under the straw-matting roof.

The banks of this lovely stream are shaded by the beautiful chenar tree, justly an object of pride and held in reverence by the Hindu Kashmeri, for, in his belief, the spirits of his departed relatives hover round those trees. A narrow, zigzag path leads to the dizzy height which overlooks this valley. It is called the Takht-i-Suliman, a ruined mosque crowns it. It was built in honor of the hero Suliman, who, with his Mogul masters (once conquerors of Kashmir), passed into oblivion ages ago.

Here we take breath, and look about on the grand scene spread before us. To the east, the foot-hills of the Himalayas; to the north, some of the higher peaks,

How a Saloon Town was Cleansed

NEWBURG, Indiana, for a number of years, has had the reputation of being "open." Saloon-keepers were allowed to do business on Sunday, games of chance were played, and shops were open everywhere. The morality of the community declined so rapidly that the decent people became alarmed. Meetings were held to consider the best means of suppressing the evil. Rev. J. T. Moody, pastor of one of the Presbyterian churches of Newburg, was appealed to, and consented to be a candidate for Town Clerk. He received sufficient votes to elect him. One of his first acts was to post notices in conspicuous places about town, calling attention to the Sunday laws, and notifying the public that all violators would be punished. The owners of gambling devices were ordered to remove them at once. Shops, except drug stores, were ordered closed. The notices were signed by Mr. Moody as Clerk, and caused a decided sensation. Many ridiculed the attempted reform, but on the first Sunday after the announcement had been made, a remarkable state of affairs prevailed. Not a saloon or store was open, except drug stores; disreputable resorts were absolutely closed. Next day, two wagons, loaded with gambling slot machines were hauled out of the place. The Sunday following it was noted that the attendance at the churches had largely increased, and that many of the newcomers were men and boys who before had seldom been seen there. The change for the better was quickly appreciated by the people as a benefit to the community.

REV. J. T. MOODY

Pastor Moody states that his only object was to make a "clean town" of Newburg, and the popular verdict is that he has succeeded.

An Illinois Revival

Evangelists Hart and Magaun, of Fairbury, Ill., have been conducting Union Revival Meetings with the Protestant Churches of Rockwell City, Ia., in their large tent, which has a seating capacity of 2,000. The meetings lasted over two weeks, and notwithstanding the continuous rains, large audiences attended, and great interest was manifested. All the churches will receive additions from those converted in the meeting, and all were greatly strengthened spiritually. These evangelists are now closing their tenth year's work. During the present year they have witnessed over two hundred seekers in their meetings. They expect to be engaged in Central States this fall.

on the floor just as Mr. Edwards began to gesticulate, so the only thing that happened to punctuate one of his periods was the knocking of the tumbler into the audience, where two deaf old farmers successfully dodged it as it whizzed past them. Mr. Edwards sat down mopping his perspiring head, and Mr. Sage rose to introduce the first reader of the temperance story, "Miss Esther Harris, of Colby High School, who will read the first chapter of a story entitled, 'His Mother's Prayers.'"

Esther went forward slowly, and the immense crowd became so still that Douglas remembered afterwards that two birds were singing on the other side of the creek, and their notes rose clear and distinct as Esther began.

At first he was afraid she was not going to be heard. Some persons on the bank farthest away began to move down nearer the front. But in a few moments Esther was evidently reaching the farthest listener with her strong, clear, distinct enunciation. Mr. Edwards leaned forward with a satisfied smile. Douglas felt satisfied and proud. Mr. Sage sat with his mouth open in delight, and the chorus stopped fidgeting and turned their faces towards the reader.

. . . . . .

"I'm sick of the old farm and everything about it," said Andrew Miner, as he came into the kitchen of the little farmhouse one evening and set a pail of milk down on the table.

"What's gone wrong now?"

"Everything. We don't have anything fit to do with. It's just slave all day to make a living, and we're no better off than when father died. I don't see the use. I want to quit it, mother, and go to town. Let's sell this old farm and go to town."

"And who'd buy the old farm, and pay anything for it, if we put it up for sale?" asked an older boy coming in at that moment and putting another pail of milk down on the table. "The Cranes have had their farm on the market two years, now, and no buyers. If we put it up to auction we couldn't get a song for it. Talk a little sense."

THWARTED PLANS

David Refused Permission to Build the Temple

By Mrs. M. Baxter

WHILE under the pressure of enemies to be conquered or special work to be done, many Christians are strung up to the need of the occasion. But with how many, when a time of relaxation follows, the spiritual tone declines! It is just then that we appear as we really are. David's heart went out in adoration—his relaxation was to write and to sing psalms of praise to his God. And then, having time to meditate, his thoughts ran on the line of what he could do to honor his God. And he said to Nathan the prophet, "See now, I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains." And Nathan said to the king what was in his own heart, without waiting for a message from God: he spoke more as a courtier than as a prophet, "Go, do all that is in thine heart; for the Lord is with thee."

But God had a message through his prophet; and the same night he spake to Nathan his own word, "Go and tell my servant David, thus saith the Lord, shalt thou build me a house for me to dwell in? for I have not dwelt in a house since the day that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle." There is a principle involved here. We may offer to man what we desire him to accept of us, excepting it be one who is in a high position. In that case, he must signify his consent to accept anything from his inferiors. Nathan was not considering the greatness of God when he spoke his own first word to the king.

Prophets need to learn, and it must have been a humbling lesson to Nathan when he had to take his own word back again to make room for the message of the Lord. In how much Christian work we go on the lines of Nathan's word to David, and do all that is in our heart, instead of waiting to know whether that which we offer is according to God's heart, and really acceptable to him! Yet God does not repress his servant David, he accepts the will, but at the same time shows him that not he, but his son, would be the man chosen to build the temple. He reminds David of his Divine election, and of the direct hand of God in all his victories. All he was, all he had done, he owed equally to his faithful God.

Nathan did not shirk the task committed to him: "According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David." And David was overwhelmed: the king sank into nothingness in his own eyes, and he recognized how fully God's plan of action was always according to his Word, and consistently with his character—"according to thine own heart."

God loves to be understood and appreciated by his creatures. He knew David could count on him, and he could count on David. "Wherefore thou art great, O Lord God: for there is none like thee, neither is there any God beside thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears." The great favor which God showed David did not uplift him. In the light of God's greatness he saw himself very small. But he saw a dignity put upon his people by the great fact of their election by God to be his people. If Israel, God's earthly people, existed only to be a people unto God, and to make him a name, what, then, is the purpose of the existence of that people for his name, whom he is now taking out from the nations? (Acts 15: 14). Is it not that in his dealings with us he may make himself a name?

His people of old did not understand him. David understood, the prophets, from Samuel onward, understood: some pious women—Hannah, Samuel's mother, Abigail, Elizabeth, John Baptist's mother—understood. Simeon, and Anna, the prophetess, understood; but the men of the Jewish people never realized their vocation. And surely the mantle of their ignorance and unbelief has fallen upon the outward Christian Church, which so little understands her calling! How few there are who are "not of the world even as Christ was not of the world!" How few understand their heavenly citizenship and look day by day for the coming Saviour, who shall change the body of our humiliation that it may be fashioned like unto the body of his glory (Phil. 3: 20, 21.)

A Boy and Girl Marriage*

STARTLINGLY original, Alwyn Ravendale, by Evelyn Everett-Green, certainly is not. On the contrary, you read it through with the rather pleasant feeling that you are renewing an acquaintance with an old friend, who appears in capital form. For the writing of the book is most excellently done; and the characters, though they are certainly related to other people who have lived in the world of fiction, still stand out with a pleasant individuality.

Early in the book there is a pretty scene, where the hero and the heroine plight their troth in the woods:

"I'm going away, Lady Baby—going right away—oh, ever so far off; I'm not coming back ever any more."

"You must be my knight, boy," cried the little girl, with sudden imperiousness. "Every knight belongs to his lady love. I'll be your lady, and you must be my knight."

The boy's face flushed from brow to chin.

"Oh, Lady Baby, may I? Will you give me a token?"

"Torse I will—as many as you like. But, boy, I think we'd better be married before you go away."

"Married! Can we be married?"

"Torse we can, if we like. I've got a pray-book with it all in. We can marry ourselves out here to-morrow, and then you'll be my knight, and I shall be your lady-love always."

She had spoken—he had only to obey.

"Boy, have you got a ring?"

He shook his head and anxiously awaited her farther pleasure.

"Never mind. I'll get one from somewhere and bring it to you. You can't get married without a ring, you know."

"Lady Baby, are you sure—quite, quite sure—that you really mean it?"

"Torse I am. I want to have you for my very own knight for ever and ever."

The next day they meet again; the little girl has brought with her a ring; the boy his mother's prayer-book, on the fly-leaf of which is written, in his father's hand, "To my dear wife on her marriage day. A. R."

"'We must read in turns,' she said. 'Where it says, "M" it means boy, and where it says "N" it means Baby. Now I shall begin and you must answer.' She opened the book, composed her face to lines of great gravity and began to read, 'Boy, wilt thou have this woman,' and on to the end of the paragraph, and the boy answered with fervent earnestness, 'I will.'

"And when her declaration was made, with smiling confidence he took the ring and placed it on her finger, his face growing very grave, whilst hers was dimpling all over with delight at the appearance of the wide gold ring.

"He was her knight—she belonged to him and he to her. A tie had been formed between them that nothing but death could break.

"Very carefully, with a bit of lead pencil, the boy wrote afresh upon the fly-leaf of the prayer-book, 'To my dear wife, on her marriage day. A. R.'

"And then he placed the book in the hands of the delighted child."

An Oregon Romance

THE scenes of William A. Ilo's novel Hazel Pierce, are laid in Oregon. The author has successfully enveloped his characters with the Western atmosphere. He is, too, a good story teller, though the book weakens in a very marked way towards the end. Unfortunately, he has chosen to depict more or less despicable characters; but this does not prevent the book from being true to life. It is a clever piece of rough-hewn work.

[Hazel Pierce, by William A. Ilo. Hograve & Co., New York. $1.50.]

A Legend of the Fight for the Great River

Margarita, by Elizabeth W. Champney, is a historical novel. Three parts history, one part novel. Bienville, D'Iberville, Chevalier Ionty, John Law, the many times millionaire Crozat—such is the company to which you are introduced. On the whole, a smoothly written story and interesting.

JOSEPH'S TRAITS*

Lessons from the Life of the Prisoner Who Became Ruler

THE problem that puzzled Job and his friends comes out vividly in the life of Joseph. How is it, Joseph might well have asked, that his brothers were permitted to sell him into slavery, and that when he had a place of confidence and was prospering, a false charge was brought against him and God allowed him to be thrown into prison. Is not the good man protected? Does not righteousness insure prosperity? The spectacle of Joseph faithful to principle, conscientious in service, holding fast his faith in God in spite of all that had happened to him is wonderfully grand. How many of us would have abandoned our confidence if adversity like Joseph's had fallen upon us! As he went about the prison, with the stigma of a foul crime upon him, he must have realized that it does not always pay in a worldly sense to be good. Yet he was evidently cheerful, and was not so absorbed in his own sorrows as to be heedless of the misery of others. This prison warder could take an interest in the anxiety of his fellow-prisoners.

Thirteen years he waited before the tide turned. Even the butler whom he had cheered and encouraged, forgot him in prosperity. It must have seemed to him that God also had forgotten him. His patience was marvelous. Then, too, how modest he was. Pharaoh gave him the credit of being able to interpret dreams. Why should not Joseph accept it? Why speak to this heathen king about God, whom he knew not? It is not every one, even among ourselves who is ready to testify of God before men who know him not and to disclaim honors that are tendered in good faith. But Joseph answers promptly, "It is not in me; God shall give an answer."

Think, too, of the magnanimity of the man. Had he forgotten the cruel pit? Had he lost all memory of the ruthlessness with which his brothers sold him into slavery? When he had them in his power, was he not justified in punishing them? Yet he will not even allow them to reproach themselves. It was God who had sent him there to preserve life. Nothing about his suffering, nothing about their wickedness in selling him. He recognized the Divine providence and had no reproaches for his brothers.

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. Mary Ann Poland, passed away on July 31, at her home near Petersburg, after a wellspent life of eighty years. She possessed a rare Christian character. She was a member of Grace Protestant Episcopal Church, Petersburg, and attended divine services as long as her physical powers would permit, when she became a shut-in. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was, during those last peaceful years, a great source of comfort and consolation to the aged believer.

Mrs. Mary Willis Phelps, who passed away on March 12 last at Olive Branch, O., was born near Auburn, N.Y., in 1830, of godly parents, was from very childhood one of the "Lord's own." Frail and delicate always, she passed through ordeals which would have overcome many stronger natures. Sorrow and losses by fire and death, hardships of war and pioneer life, and later afflictions in the loss of sight and hearing—all she bore with unwavering faith. Her Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were always near her, and when sight failed she listened for hours while her loved paper was read. It was a great joy to her when she could occasionally aid some worthy causes there represented. Her last moments were those of a true believer, trusting confidently in her Saviour. "Her children rise up and call her blessed."

Mrs. Evangela Everall Hayes, widow of Addison H. Hayes, of Kingston, N. Y., died recently. She was a noble Christian woman interested in many benevolences. For many years she had been a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Rev. John McGregor passed away at Brimley, Mich., July 9. He had been interested for a number of years in practical Christian work and the distribution of religious literature, and had scattered many copies of this journal through the lumber camps. He was greatly loved and respected, especially among the lumber men.

Mrs. O. S. McCully, a noble Christian wife and mother, passed away recently at Helena, Okla., after a brief illness. She leaves a family to mourn her loss.

Christina Baumberger was born in Switzerland, Oct. 21, 1821, and died at the home of her son, Fred Baumberger, in McMechen, W. Va., Aug. 3, 1903. She was the only daughter of the Rev. Baumberger for many years pastor of an evangelical church in Monroe Co., O. In 1845, she was married to Samuel Baumberger, who, about eighteen months ago, preceded her to their eternal home. They had eleven children, nine of whom are still living. Early in life Mrs. Baumberger was converted, and joined the German Methodist Church. She was an excellent Christian character, and is mourned by a very large circle of friends.

How much is expressed in those two words—"I forgot!" Thousands of human lives and millions of dollars worth of property have been sacrificed to a faulty memory!

"HE LEADETH ME"

IN pastures green? Not always; sometimes He Who knoweth best in kindness leadeth me
In weary ways, where heavy shadows be.

Out of the sunshine, warm and soft and bright
Out of the sunshine into darkest night;
I oft' would faint with sorrow and affright.

Only for this—I know He holds my hand,
So whether in the green or desert land
I trust, although I may not understand.

And by still waters? No, not always so;
Ofttimes the heavy tempest round me blow,
And o'er my soul the waves and billows go.

But when the storm beats loudest, and I cry
Aloud for help, the Master standeth by,
And whispers to my soul, "Lo! it is I."

Above the tempest wild I hear Him say;
"Beyond this darkness lies the perfect day;
In every path of thine I lead the way."

So whether on the hilltops high and fair
I dwell, or in the sunless valley, where
The shadows lie—what matter? He is there.

And more than this; where'er the pathway lead,
He gives to me no helpless, broken reed,
But his own hand sufficient for my need.

So where He leadeth I can safely go;
And in the blest hereafter I shall know
Why, in his wisdom, he hath led me so.

FIRST THINGS FIRST*

The Spiritual to Take Precedence in Time and Importance of the Temporal

RIGHT perspective is as necessary in the conduct of life as it is in drawing. The question Christ bids us to ask ourselves is, What matters are most important to a man? Those once discovered, it is only common prudence to make them the first consideration. A great preacher compares a man who makes a mistake in this matter to a man about to take a railroad journey. He checks his baggage, he goes to the news-stand and buys his favorite paper, and perhaps a book to read in the car. He worries and frets about getting a good seat with his things around him ready to his hand. But at the last moment the conductor asks him about his ticket, and he discovers that he has forgotten that. He is most anxious to get to his journey's end; but there is now no time to get his ticket; he must get out and wait for the next train. He was anxious enough and worried enough, but not about the essential thing.

Christ is not encouraging improvidence, nor negligence of business; but he says, make religion your chief concern. All else should be subordinated to that. Why? The answer is simple. Because the spirit is more than the body. It will live longer; it will involve happiness or misery. See to that first. Afterwards the body may receive attention. His argument is logical. It should come first in point of time. Death may come at any time, and then it is too late. The cares of business, the responsibilities of life may engross the mind later on, and prevent the mind devoting itself to the means of salvation. Therefore, at the outset of your career attend to the salvation of the soul, and all else will follow easily.

Then it should be first in point of importance. There are some people who hold their religion lightly. They excuse themselves for inconsistencies by saying, "A man must live." When a question of principle arises, and a man has to decide between obeying God and disobeying him to avoid loss or to make a gain, the struggle is oftentimes very hard. Inclination pulls one way, and conscience the other. Christ requires of us fidelity at any cost. Men have given up their lives rather than surrender their faith. And this is duty. No money we can gain can balance spiritual loss. The important things must always come first.

E STAR of BETHLEHEM

nexpected Latter-Day Evidence hich Corroborates the Bible Story

ARLY three hundred years ago (says a writer in the Chicago Inter Ocean), the astronomer Kepler, a devout as well as armed man, sought mathematically to onstrate the truth of the Bible story of tar of Bethlehem. Applying the laws of otion of the stars he had discovered, he lated that on the night of Dec. 25-26, , there occurred, visible in Palestine, a mum conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn. is, on that night the two planets, as seen that part of the earth, were directly in nd for a time would be seen as one star, ining the brilliancy of both. Kepler ght this conjunction explained the ap- ance of the unusually bright, strange star h amazed the shepherds, and which the men saw as they came from the East.

en scholars, working on New Testament nology, became satisfied that the dates ionysius, then generally received, were rect. They found evidence that Herod Great, said in the Gospels to have been g at the time of the Nativity, died in the year before that then accepted as the of the Christian era. In fact, it is gener- admitted now, though convenience pre- s a change, that this is not the 1903d year the birth of Jesus, but at least the 1907th, probably the 1900th.

is discovery of the error in the tradition- ronology, though it confirmed Kepler's lations indirectly, did not cause his sug- on about the Star of Bethlehem to be lly accepted. That the conjunction of wo planets occurred about that time was itted, but it was not considered proved Jesus was born on exactly that night. act, the tendency was to regard the story he star as a wonder tale, produced by the ersal human habit of associating remark- natural events with the births and deaths onspicuous personages.

t now Baron F. von Aefele, in a pamphlet ished at Berlin, points out that this maxi- conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn is ribed in a list of the positions of the plan- from 17 B.C. to 10 A.D., lately discovered gypt. Furthermore, the old Egyptian gazer gives a number of details that cor- ond closely with those set down in the nd chapter of Matthew. Yet again, the ek word translated "stood" in Matthew's ount, which most commentators have de- ed to be a poetical expression, turns out e the technical term used by the Egyptian onomer to describe the conjunction of iter and Saturn, which he records as oc- ing at a date corresponding to Dec. 26, 6 ., of our calendar.

aron von Aefele draws from this confir- ion of Kepler's computations and Mat- w's narrative, the conclusion that the istmas festival was fixed on Dec. 25, not ause it was the time of the Roman Satur- a, or the festival of some popular pagan , but because the early Christians knew ctly when the Founder of their faith ap- red as a child among men.

he main interest of the matter to Chris- s is that this old Egyptian record, taken Kepler's calculations, confirms the Gos- narrative. It shows that the birth of the nder of their faith was attended by an ex- tional aspect of the heavens. And thus con- s the veracity of the Gospel narrative.

God Heard Their Cry

RS. C. M. H., Monee, Ill., writes: "I have been a CHRISTIAN HERALD reader many years and have been much impress- by the answered prayer testimonies, also the accounts of revival efforts that have n published from time to time. As I read these things my heart yearned to know re of Christ and the power of the Holy irit. I promised God if he would manifest oself in my life and in this community, I uld tell of it, and I take this means of ng it, hoping it may help others. A year o, we had no English services in this vil- e and none of any kind on Sunday even- s. The efforts that had been made along s line were so unsatisfactory that nearly all American families had moved away. The ospect seemed dark indeed! But four wo- n prayed that God would open the way. e wrote to the Moody Bible Institute tell- our needs and asked what they could do us. They sent us a young man, Mr. A. E. nderson, who had been at the institute t one year, and had never preached before, t he was filled with the Holy Spirit. He ked the Christians over and over to pray r the meetings. The attendance was small, d we had no money. We learned to de- nd entirely upon God for everything. And w he has blessed the work! The people me out to the meetings; the money came ; believers were strengthened and united in ristian fellowship, and several conversions llowed. We held no sociables or festivals, t prayed from week to week that God uld supply our need, and he always did.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Edward F., Binghamton, N. Y. 1. What are the "reforms" proposed by Russia and Austria with reference to Macedonia? 2. Why do not those "Christian" Powers intervene to stop the slaughter of defenceless women and children of their own faith by the fanatical Moslems? The spectacle is a burning disgrace to the whole civilized world.

1. The proposed reforms relate to administrative methods in Macedonia, and include the appointment of a Christian governor and certain Christian subordinates, and also the giving of "guarantees" by Turkey. The Macedonians, however, want entire independence from Turkey, and the Bulgarians favor this and may go to war to bring it about. Turkey seeks nothing better than to be let alone, and permitted to settle the trouble in the old way, by massacre and conflagration. 2. The same question has been asked repeatedly. The answer is that the first step taken by any Power looking toward intervention, would precipitate a general European war. But there is no reason why the united Powers should not co-operate in putting an end to the massacres.

J. T., Philadelphia, Pa. Too little thought has been given to home missionary work. Take the great body of men in our large cities who come from all over the world—strangers, without friends—only to meet temptation. Lead the men to Christ, and your benevolent object will be a star in your crown.

This is precisely the field that is now filled by such organizations as the Bowery Mission, New York, where the Gospel is daily and nightly preached to the homeless and the wanderer, and where hands of helpfulness are held out to the needy stranger and to those that have made shipwreck of life, and who are literally "stranded." Thousands of men and youths of many nationalities, who have fallen by the wayside, have been helped by the Bowery Mission. Its converts may be found in almost every land under the sun.

Christian, Milford, Pa. Why do they have healthy people to bathe and bandage the South African lepers? Can they not train lepers to perform these tasks? Does not the Colonial Government build asylums and provide for the material needs of the lepers?

It is necessary that some one should be devoted exclusively to these unfortunates, with a view to assuaging their physical sufferings, as well as giving them the Gospel. Only a few brave souls have ever done this and these at long intervals. Of course they train the lepers to be self-helpful, but it is a peculiarity of leprosy in the Orient that it makes its victim indifferent to everything that calls for effort, and were the lepers to be neglected, they would eventually be in a most frightful condition. Humanity, as well as Christianity, demands that they be not neglected.

R. McD., Scranton, Pa. When I was a very young man, I read Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, and I can truthfully say that that book, or my reading of it, marked the spiritual turning-point of my life. It was a great blessing to me, as it had been to countless multitudes before me. Why cannot THE CHRISTIAN HERALD include The Pilgrim's Progress among its wonderful series of Premium books? Next to the Bible, there is no book so precious and none so helpful and inspiring. If you should publish it, I feel assured that the blessing I experienced would be shared by your host of readers. I believe you could not render a greater service to them, or to the cause of Christ, than by putting Bunyan's grand story of Christian struggle and triumph in hundreds of thousands of American homes.

Inquirer, Boston, Mass. Is it possible that Socrates and other great and good men who never heard the Gospel, are hopelessly lost?

Such inquiries need not concern us. We may be quite sure that God will deal justly with all men. Our privileges are the measure of our responsibility. The only clue we have to questions of this kind are the words of our Lord: (Luke 12: 48) that those who did not know their Lord's will and did things worthy of stripes, should be beaten with few stripes. Those who wilfully disobeyed in spite of knowledge were those who would have to bear many stripes. God is just and merciful, and knowing that there is no need to distress ourselves about matters with which we have no concern.

Subscriber, Scranton, Pa. Do the miracles of Christ prove him to have been divine?

If you mean that his divinity rests upon the miracles, we doubt it. There were other and better proofs of his divinity. He never desired to be regarded as a wonder worker. It was a concession to the demands of the time that he worked miracles. They merely served to attest his credentials and to secure the attention of the people. Moses, Elijah and Elisha had worked miracles, and when Jesus taught with authority, the people asked him where he obtained it he convinced them by miracle. Read Matt. 9: 2-7 to get Christ's conception of the purpose of miracles.

Ida S. M., Randolph, Vt. Your letter is probably meant as a good-natured satire upon the discussion over a business education for women. The position of this journal on the subject was stated editorially in the same issue which contained the symposium. As to the moral standard among women being affected injuriously or otherwise by a business career, that must be relegated to the domain of individual experience. There are, unfortunately, employers and surroundings that are not conducive to a high standard of morality, but these we believe to be the exception. No one could declare with truthfulness that business life makes women less moral than their more domestic sisters, although it may make them less sensitive, as a result of cultivating the qualities of self-reliance and independence, and substituting a degree of brusqueness for shyness and reserve.

Estelle, New York. 1. Is a beautiful valentine suitable for a parlor? 2. Do school-teachers command higher salaries in the Western States than in the East, or can any one with an education demand better wages West than East?

1. No; if by "suitable" you refer to hanging it up on the walls, or exposing it on a table or elsewhere, it is certainly out of place in a parlor. A valentine is in the nature of a private and personal communication. 2. For accurate information write to the Normal Instructor, Dansville, N. Y.

Mrs. A. M. Connersville, Ind. Is it right to ride on the train with a child past six years of age, not paying, because the conductor does not ask it? I recently made a trip with my child, doing this, and after my return home, had a strong conviction that I had done wrong in not buying a ticket for her.

If the child is over the prescribed age, you should have paid fare, of course. It is a good sign that your conscience troubles you, after you knowingly do a wrong act.

R. S. E., Toronto, Ont. Why did Pilate propose to scourge Jesus, when he plainly declared that he found no fault in him?

It was an attempt to compromise. The Jews demanded that he should be executed. Pilate probably thought they would not listen to a proposal to acquit him. Like a weak man, as he was, and fearing the complaints of his misconduct which the Jews might justly make to Cæsar against him, he tried to propitiate them with inflicting a milder punishment than they demanded.

E. P. M., Stennett, Ia. The Czar of Russia issued a call for a Peace Conference to devise means to prevent war. Would it not be proper, under existing circumstances, for the President of the United States to issue a call to reassemble that Conference, to devise means to stop Turkey from committing such brutal massacres, as the Powers of Europe are afraid to protest?

To do so, would seem as though we desired to assume undue authority in European affairs. A protest from our Government to the European Powers, would have all the desired effect, and would not be open to the same objection.

Reader New York City. When Job's wife urged him to curse God and die, did she mean commit suicide, or did she expect death would follow cursing God?

She was simply impatient with her husband's submissive spirit. His condition was so miserable that she thought death would be a relief. As the Revised Version shows, her counsel was not to curse God, but to renounce him as a God who did not protect his servants. She had the disposition which Sat falsely imputed to Job, of cleaving to G only so long as it paid to do so. Thus s practically advised him to cease such servi even though death might be the penalty.

Anxious Reader, Yonkers, N. Y. Is it true cording to a passage I have heard read fr the Bible, which I cannot now find, that a p son of illegitimate birth cannot hope for sal tion?

You must have misunderstoo the passage. You may be qu sure that no one will be exclud from God's presence through t faults of others. The passage y refer to is probably Deut. 23: 2. appears to refer to service in t Tabernacle. The meaning you su gest is so contrary to the principl of justice and of the Divine go ernment that we are confident has no Scriptural foundation.

L. E. L., Three Rivers, Mass. Is not a sin, whilst there are so ma who are in want from hunger, th there should be such a great was of food, not only in New York Cit but in all large cities of the Unit States? I cannot understand ho a wasteful nation like the Ame cans can have the blessing of Go Not long ago I was reading ho the people of New York and oth large cities wasted good food l the barrelful—good meat, bread, cakes, fru etc.—and I was thinking, instead of throwi away good food, why not let the very poor c lect the waste food every day. Or why shou there not be a system organized, so th all good food thrown away be distribute among the poor?

There is no such wholesale waste in Ne York as you seem to imagine. While it is tru that there are many individual cases of wast fulness, yet the people as a whole are n wilfully wasteful. In many hotels and re taurants the surplus or "broken" food is sol or given to the poor. No food that can b safely used is sent to the dumping ground, but is always carefully picked over by som of the many hundreds of men and wome who collect from barrels and boxes ever morning in all great cities. As to the fru and meat that are sent away, you probabl refer to the food that is condemned by th Health Officers as unfit for human consump tion, and ordered to be destroyed.

AROUND AN OPEN-AIR RESTAURANT AT LAHORE, INDIA

Lahore, the capital of the Punjaub, is one of the ancient walled cities of India. Its beautiful palaces, temples, and mosques, its lofty, picturesque dwellings of brick, with their projecting balconies and ornamental lattice work, its fragrant gardens, its narrow, winding streets, its densely crowded bazaars, combine to make it a place of peculiar interest for the visitor. It once had a population double, if not treble, the present number. Outdoor restaurants, such as that shown in the illustration, are common to all large Indian cities. They are found in the neighborhood of the bazaars, and around them the natives congregate daily, to eat rice, sip sweets and coffee, and exchange the gossip of the market-place.

F. F. BELSEY, PREST. JAS. NISBET, FOUNDER SURREY CHAPEL, WHERE THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION WAS FOUNDED IN 17[illegible] [illegible]

A GREAT SUNDAY SCHOOL CENTENARY

Twenty-four Million Children and Teachers Now in the British Sunday School Union, Founded One Hundred Years Ago

THREE young men met, one hundred years ago, on the far side of the Atlantic—they met in the world's greatest city, to consider one of the world's greatest needs—the saving of the children. We sing of the "Century's swinging portal," and the "Breaking of the new dawn." Only the golden reed of the Temple can measure the doorway of this century of work for the children, inaugurated by those three young men in old Surrey Chapel, London, under the eye of Rowland Hill.

It was in the month of roses, when the memorable three—William Brodie Gurney, Thomas Thompson, and James Nisbet—the oldest twenty-five, the youngest eighteen—met in this historic chapel, one hundred years ago, to found the Sunday School Union. Twenty-five years earlier, Robert Raikes had founded the Sunday School work, but it was largely secular in its influence. Factories and mills claimed the time and attention of the young, and the training given on the Sabbath was intended to make up for the loss of educational advantages.

Young Brodie Gurney was inspired with a passion to reach the spiritual values for which the day was intended. With this in view, he first held counsel with a few kindred souls in his own school, in the then pleasant village of Walworth, now a part of teeming London. He made excursions across the Thames, visiting other schools, and noting their methods and improvements. He said to one of the superintendents, "We ought to improve all our schools. Your school is better than ours, and you tell me there are schools better than yours. Why should we not get Sunday School teachers together, and try to improve, if possible, our plan of instruction, and stimulate others to open new schools in London?"

Here, then, was born the Sunday School Union. Gurney summoned a meeting at Surrey Chapel July 13, 1803. The attendance was large, and the young worker was appointed its first Secretary. Thus was launched a millennium for the children. Rowland Hill lent a fostering hand to the beneficent enterprise. Surrey Chapel in that day combined beneath one roof the Exeter Hall and the Metropolitan Tabernacle of a later day. Thither the people flocked to gain tidings of missions and drink in new inspirations for making new religious frontiers. Surrey Chapel is now used for the display of electric light apparatus—but it was eminently fitting that the Sunday School Union, which a few weeks ago celebrated its first century of life and blessing to the world, should assemble in "old Surrey" for a commemorative service.

The centenary services were inspiring and interesting. Best of all the meetings was the Saturday morning Praise Service, held—by courtesy of the proprietors, and amid all sorts of lamps—in the room where the voice of the great preacher, Rowland Hill, is still an echo, and where the lamp of life to thousands upon thousands of children, was first set burning. It was a wonderful hour. The occasion was retrospective. Gurney, Thompson and Nisbet lived again. Mr. Wybrow, who, sixty years ago, was a pupil in the school, delivered an address. Pointing up at the green walls where once stood the grand old organ, he said, "The first tune I remember being played, was, 'I think when I read that sweet story of old.' Here we are at another milepost in the journey. That hymn which has since been caroled by ten thousand times ten thousand children, was written in 1841, on the back of an envelope in a stage coach, by Mrs. Luke, the daughter of Thomas Thompson, one of the founders of the Sunday School Union."

Mrs. Luke, a saintly woman, is now whitened with the snows of ninety winters. She lives in the Isle of Wight. She sent a touching and beautiful message to the meetings, with the wish, "May it be ours, whose term is nearly ended, to welcome earlier arrivals with the joyous cry:

'Lift your head, ye gates;
Let the little travelers in.'"

Another notable event during the celebration was the effective and helpful ministry of the American speakers, Revs. Dr. Potts and Dr. Schauffler, Marlton Lawrance and George Hamilton Archibald, who made easy conquests, and the audiences could not seem to get enough of them nor their message.

Mr. F. F. Belsey, a Justice of the Peace and a most enthusiastic worker, is the President of the Union, and the Rev. Carey Bonner is the Secretary. Both are men of marked abilities, and both are filled with zeal for the cause of the children. The Sunday School Union has been a most influential agency in extending and elevating Biblical study in Great Britain and its dependencies. Its literature covers the widest range. The Union headquarters, at "Old Bailey," fairly teems with literature and Sunday School appliances. A notable feature of their work is the "Traveling Library" (now well known also in educational work in the United States). In its Sunday School Union Teachers' Training College, 1,356 teachers received instruction in Bible teaching last year. Four hundred young people competed last year for the scholars' national prize, and fifty thousand entered last year for the scholars' Scriptural examination. Bible lands and Bible story have been converted into slides, costumes have been prepared illustrating the manners and customs of the Orient, until lantern and costume make a new Palestine to Old England. More than two thousand schools used these helpful facilities to Bible study.

From that far away and humble beginning in Old Surrey Chapel the Union claims a membership of over two millions of teachers, three-fourths of whom belong to the United Kingdom, and one-fourth to the British colonies and the Indian Empire. These voluntary workers have under their care more than twenty-two millions of children.

The true method by which each generation helps generation is by giving energy in struction—heart stamina [illegible] millions of teachers and [illegible] are in debted to those three young men who organized the Sunday School Union. This is the outcome of one hundred years of self-denying effort. It means three men against twenty-four millions to the good [illegible] How many will it mean against twenty-four millions in the coming century! Who shall name the host of the children to be ultimately brought to the Saviour by this tremendous and divinely blessed agency, which was so humble and unpretentious in its beginnings?

Bearing and Forbearing

TEXT — Philippians 4: 5: "Let your moderation be known unto all men"

WHAT does the Pauline word, "moderation," mean? "I know," says one. "It means: Do not be an extremist; do not ride a hobby to death; do not focus your eyes upon one truth so long, that you become blinded to the relative importance of other truths, nor upon one error until you lose sight of 'the evil effects of all other errors. 'Virtue is a road which has a hedge and a ditch on both sides,' once wrote a famous writer. A man may be moderate in one thing, and not in another. A man may be an ascetic as far as eating and drinking are concerned, and yet he may be licentious. A man who has no ambition, may be avaricious." It is not enough to be right in one matter, if you are careless on other matters equally important.

"Let your moderation be known unto all men," means: Do not be a fanatic, a one-sided monstrosity, like a dove with one wing cropped, flapping about in the barnyard, and yet unable to rise ten feet into God's great heaven of blue. Do not expend all your energies preaching against the evils of intoxication, and at the same time be a glutton. Do not preach against gambling with cards, when you gamble with railroad stocks. Do not berate the thief who steals a loaf of bread and honor the thief who cheats his neighbor in a real estate deal. Do not advocate physical culture to such an extent that you ride one hundred miles a day on a bicycle, or be such a "fresh-air fiend," that your open window in the railroad train will be blowing a dangerous draught upon the passengers who sit in your rear. Be a well-rounded man. Be like a plant with leaves and pistils, and stamens and sepals and petals, growing upon a supple stem, able to bend every whither, yet with roots anchored in the solid earth, and not like a balloon filled with a noxious gas, tossed about in the air, the plaything of every stray wind.

Christian Gentleness

That the Pauline idea? No, my friend, you are wrong. When Paul says, "Let your moderation be known unto all men," he was not, as Bishop Villiers once expressed it, "alluding to the gratification of our desires generally, but especially temperance, or self-restraint in our relation to others, in our abstinence from anger and harshness and vengeance." He is saying, as the Revised Version translates the sentence, "Let your forbearance or gentleness be known unto all men." To-day, instead of preaching upon what you should eat and drink, and wherewith you be clothed, and how much exercise you should take, I shall preach upon how you should smile and talk, and shake hands, and forgive, and love. This sermonic theme is not "How we should live," but "How we should be willing to let others live."

Be patient, in the first place, even with the irritating idiosyncrasies and the offensive mannerisms that are found in almost every one with whom we come in contact. Be patient with their peculiarities, especially if they are non-essentials in reference to the honesty and the noble characteristics of a man. Be patient especially, because wrong types of marked individuality, if harnessed in the right way, will often mean great success for us and for those whom it is our privilege to influence.

Eccentricities of Genius

A strange law decrees that insanity is sometimes the handmaid of genius. The inspired eye, which, afar off, can discover a star, is often so near-sighted that it cannot see a diamond glittering close at hand. Samuel Johnson once said, in reference to the blind poet of England: "Milton, madam, was a genius who could cut a colossus from a rock, but could not carve heads upon cherry stones." The greatest of poets, and musicians, and artists, and sculptors, statesmen, dramatists, lawyers, physicians and ministers, have sometimes been men of startling weakness, as well as of startling strength. Like Atlas, their shoulders were big and strong enough to carry a world upon their backs. Like Alfred the Great, their fingers were too clumsy and forgetful to care for a fire which the wife had detailed them to watch, while she was looking after the other household cares. Geniuses are often most exasperating. I always had a great deal of sympathy for Xantippe, who has been branded as the female arch-scold of the ages. Perhaps she had a right to scold. She was married to Socrates, the greatest genius of all Greece.

The startling characteristics, good or bad, which can be found in the ten-talent men on a big scale, can also be found in the one-talent men on a small scale. In the ordinary walks of life, everywhere are people cursed or marred with various imperfections. They are good people in one sense, but bad in another. We define them as "peculiar" people. We call them "peculiar," because through each runs a mental or physical weakness, as a mineral vein runs through the rocks of a mighty mountain. We say, "I like So-and-So, but he has one fearfully irritating characteristic. He will muss up a room every time he enters it." Or you say, "I like Mrs. So-and-So, but every time she calls, she makes some nettlesome remark that stings like a briar-bush. When she comes to visit me, I am always glad to welcome her. When she leaves, I am always gladder to see her go. She is never with me ten minutes without making me unhappy. She says something disagreeable about my dress, my house, my children, or my husband. Yes, I feel and know that Mrs. So-and-So is a good woman, and that she loves me; but she has the tantalizing faculty of always unintentionally saying something mean."

Tolerant in Non-Essentials

Ah, yes! All of us have had such bitter experiences as these from the irritating peculiarities of our friends. So Paul comes to us to-day in the words of my text. He says: "My brother, you must be lenient and gentle in your dealings with the faults and failings of others. You must be yielding, as the wave of an incoming tide is yielding. It first breaks itself into pieces, and then crawls up and fits itself into all the nooks and crannies of the seashore. You must be yielding in the non-essentials, so that you can cause your life to be successfully fitted into the peculiarities of others, as one factory wheel will fit into the cogs of another wheel. It means giving up a little, in order to fit your life into the non-essential peculiarities of other people. It is this useless friction; this useless rubbing each other the wrong way; this useless expecting other people to be like ourselves, instead of all people trying to bear and forbear, that has caused much, ay perhaps most, of the trouble of the world. "Let your kindness, your tolerance, your gentleness be known unto all men."

Be patient, in the next place, with those people who were born spiritually blind, because their ancestors, like the progenitors of the blind fish in Kentucky's Mammoth Cave, have passed their lives in total darkness. Be patient with those men in whose veins flows the tainted blood of generations of sinners.

Blood should be thicker than water. Blood should be a potent factor in the making or unmaking of a man. I am in no sense a fatalist. I am not one of those indifferent, never-may-care men. who try to excuse their sloth and laziness, by advocating the doctrine "What is to be, will be; and what is not to be, will not be?" I am not foolish enough to think that "a man can be born to be eternally destroyed, no matter how he may try to prevent it, or what he may do or say." But I am one of those believing people who are ready to grant that, by reason of the operation of the laws of heredity, it is harder for some people to do right than for others, and to grant also that, because of heredity, it is easier for some to do wrong than for others In the spiritual as well as in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, "like always produces like."

Patience With Evil-doers

This hereditary law, in all its different aspects being agreed upon, why should you not be patient in your dealings with those whose ancestors were not good and true and pure Christian, as were your fathers, and grandfathers, and great grandparents? Have you a right to expect the child of an Aztec sun worshiper, within the first year of his conversion, to have as beautiful a conception of the Cross as the child of that Indian missionary who, last year, gave up his life for Christ within sight of a horrible ghat, burning upon the banks of the Ganges? Have you a right to expect that young boy, whom you took from a Foundling Home and adopted, to have as easy a time living the Christian life as your own flesh and blood? Perhaps that boy is the son of two thieves, while your child is the son of a good mother. Remember, as a spiritual oculist, you cannot, in a day, open the visual windows of one born blind. Remember, it is a greater triumph to teach the deaf and the dumb to correctly pronounce the five vowel letters a-e-i-o-u, than it is to teach a well school-boy the whole of Webster's famous reply to Senator Hayne. Oh. my brother, do not fret and worry and lose your patience in your dealings with those of bad spiritual ancestry. Be gentle! Be forbearing! Be forgiving! Be kind! Be merciful! Be moderate in all things. Forgive not only seven times, but seventy times seven.

Be patient, in the next place, with the Peters of the Three Denials. There are many, very many of them. They are not the sinners who mean to do wrong, but they are the sanguine temperaments who overestimate their own abilities. They, at times, love the Lord wit all their strength; but then, underestimating the strengt of evil, they deliberately run into temptation, to l overthrown not once, but twice and thrice.

Modern Peters

The Peters of the Three Denials! Perhaps th young man whom you discharged only last week, w one of them. He was a fine young fellow. Everybody wh came in touch with him liked him. Bright? There was r brighter boy in your store. He was not only brigh but he was the son of a good Christian father. He kne better, but he would drink. He came into your offi drunk about one year ago. You forgave him onc You forgave him twice. When he did it the third tim you said: "Out you go!" And out of the store la week he went. Or, perhaps, he was that employee yours, who was arrested because he stole from yo safe, and then, to cover it up, manipulated the ledge His defalcations went on for months. Or, perhaps, h was that Peter whom you caught lying to you. Th first time you said nothing. The second time, y proved to him that he prevaricated. The third tim you discharged him on the spot. And yet, in spite those lies, of those defalcations, of those drunkennesse you could not help liking this Peter of the Thr Denials. You loved him for his own sake. You lik him on account of his father and mother. Then, n brother, if you like that lad, if you think, he has, ev yet, the makings of a good man in him, if he can ov come that one fault, why not take him back agai Why not give him another chance? "No, no," you a swer. "I have given him three different chances. Thr times are enough." Are they enough, my brothe Remember the lad's parents. Remember that he is impulsive fellow, and not bad at heart. Rememb that Christ forgave Peter again and again, until at la Peter rose above his weaknesses, and gave his life ful and freely back to Christ. Will you do as much f that young man in your employ, as Christ did for h impulsive and denying disciple?

From the filthy pieces of clothes, gathered by the ra pickers in Germany and France, I have seen the man facturers of Watervliet, Michigan, make the purest a whitest writing paper. From even the modern Pete of the three Denials, there have been developed t Peters of the martyred blood. One day General Charl George Gordon, more widely known as "Chinese" Go don, saw a handsome Chinese youth being led out execution. The condemned had been guilty of ma crimes. Gordon was struck with the looks of the la and begged for his life. He said that he himself wou guarantee that the boy would do right. Gordon's quest was granted. The famous soldier of Queen V toria and of Jesus Christ took the lad to his own qu ters. He made the Chinese boy then and there promi never to do wrong again. Did he fulfil his pledg From that day on, the most faithful servant Gord ever had about him was that boy, rescued by the Chr tian general from the executioner's axe. He follow Gordon in his Chinese mission work. He followed G don to Egypt. And the Chinese lad's blood mingl with Charles George Gordon's blood when the m sacre at Khartoum ended the earthly life of England most famous Christian soldier. Ah, the Peters of t Three Denials are worth saving.

Patient with the Censorious

Be patient, in the next place, with those sinners w have no sympathy with their fellow-men's sins. It very easy for us to pass judgment upon others. It is ve hard, however, for us to be willing to let others critici their neighbors when they themselves are flagrant guilty of the same sins. Yet everywhere we find th those Pharisaical people who themselves are most op to criticism are the most critical of others.

Salvation Army's Flying Troop

How Col. Holz and his Cavalry Squad Carried the Gospel Message to the Kentucky Mountaineers

SOMETHING over a year ago, Commander Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army, and Colonel Holz, of Cleveland, one of the Army's most energetic officers, discussed the subject of carrying Christianity to the mountaineers of the Southern States. They could not reach any definite decision; it was proposed to try to convert these people by following the old circuit-riding plan—that is, by placing one or two of their best officers in each mountain district.

JACKSON, THE LARGEST TOWN IN BREATHITT COUNTY

Last spring, when the outbreak of feuds and shooting took place in Breathitt County, the ominous crack of the 44-calibre rifle was heard along the hills, Curtis Jett, the alleged assassin of Marcum, declared that the crack of his rifle was the sweetest music ever heard in bloody Breathitt." Colonel Holz, the Cleveland Salvation Army leader, decided that the time was opportune to start with his little band across the mountains. The party included besides the Colonel himself, Major Hunter, Staff Captain Clarence Boyd, Lieutenant J. Slayton, of Cleveland; Staff Captain William Scott, Captain Althoff, of Cincinnati; Staff Captain White, Envoy Peter Tell, of Pittsburg; and candidates Bassett Gallehar, and Crabtree, who were from and reared in the mountain regions to be visited. The last named were chosen, because of their familiarity with the mountaineers. Only men were chosen, and each one had some special talent that could be used. Several of the men are instrumental musicians and vocalists.

The evangelistic trip of this intrepid and devoted little band of Salvationists was at last fairly begun. It was as an experiment that was soon to demonstrate to the world the power of the Gospel to reach the hardest hearts. From the first, the mountaineers seemed to like their methods, and the little band of Gospel cavalrymen was soon cheered by the conversion of several who were recognized as "bad men," and who, besides professing conversion, openly joined the Salvationists.

One of these, Judge John L. Noble, widely known and feared throughout the region of Jackson, Breathitt County, was the first to make a confession. Judge Noble (a witness in the trial of Curtis Jett, charged with the assassination of J. B. Marcum) said in the Gospel meeting: "I will stop my evil ways, and from this time on I will be a better man." Another convert is "Tricky Jim Beck." He was an alibi witness for the Hargis faction in the recent trials.

The trip into, and over the mountains was made on horseback. The men expected to sleep and board in the settlements visited, but lest they should have to rough it at any time, a two-horse wagon, loaded with blankets and supplies, was taken along. Staff-Capt. Escott was sent ahead of the party to Jackson, and made all arrangements. Each cavalryman wears a special Salvation Army uniform of khaki, and modeled on the lines of the United States Army field uniform. It looks natty and military. The Salvationists carry Bibles, instead of weapons, for they preach the Gospel of Love, not of arms and bloodshed. They pass through Kentucky, West Virginia and Tennessee. All the localities they visit are small mountain settlements, from twenty to twenty-five miles apart. They leave a place in the early morning and start for the next settlement, arriving there in time to hold afternoon open-air service. This meeting consists of selections by the instrumental quartet, vocal music, and addresses telling of the purpose of their visit and declaring the Gospel message of peace. Early in the evening another outdoor meeting is held, followed by a Gospel meeting in a hall, if one can be found. These outdoor meetings "break the ice" between the natives and the Salvation troopers. In the words of one of their officers:

"You see they can stand around and size us up, and therefore can be more easily induced to attend the night indoor meetings, where we get in our real work.

As you know, the mountain country is very sparsely settled, and the people, who are very poor, live in families miles from each other. When the trip is finished, no matter whether successful or not, that will not end our work in the mountains for we will leave behind us comrades Slayton, Gallehar, Bassett and Crabtree, at convenient central points, to continue what we have begun.

"Yes," he added, "there will be an element of danger, but so far we have had no serious trouble."

When the salvation troopers reached a point near Prestonburg, Ky., they had an exciting adventure. One of the troopers had inquired the way, and a woman directed them to a crowd of men at a creek bottom. The little cavalry band, leaving their wagon on the main road and taking with them some of their musical instruments, went down the side of the bluff until they saw the men working about a small log house. They were surprised at two shots being fired, and then to see men running away. They came to a halt, and wondered why the men had run.

"Stay back!" said a tall mountaineer, who stood in the path.

"We don't want to hurt anybody," was the reply of the foremost Salvationist.

"No," said the native with a grin, "but some o' you 'uns might git hurt."

A guide explained the situation. It was a moonshine still, and shots were fired as a warning to the operators to make good their escape, which they had done. The Salvation Army men hastened to explore the place. After being assured that the members were not revenue men, the operators were persuaded to come back. The Salvationists held religious services, and some of the moonshiners joined in the singing.

This unique campaign, undertaken in the name of Christ, and for the love of souls among these neglected mountain people, cannot fail to be productive of good results. Some time ago, Gen. O. O. Howard made a tour of the Cumberland and Kentucky mountains, for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in company with Rev. Mr. Guerrant, the founder and President of the Soul-Winners' Mission. During that tour, the great spiritual destitution of the mountain folk was made apparent to the world, and the American people were enlightened as never before, concerning a field for religious and philanthropic effort which had hitherto been almost unknown.

are not have the searchlight of investigation turned upon their own lives. So some of us can well make the assertion, "We despise sin, but we despise worse the sinner who is criticising sin, when he himself is guilty of the same, or even worse sins."

Inevitable Retribution

But steady, my brother; Be patient also with those who are harsh in their criticisms of others. Remember that for them a day of reckoning is coming, or perhaps has come. Who among your brothers and sisters to-day, is having the hardest times? Is it not the sister who never had in her heart any love for the common people? Is it not the sister who felt she was socially and mentally a little higher than anyone else? Who to-day is most mercilessly laid upon the dissecting table of criticism and having his whole life cut to pieces? Is it not the man who himself once most vigorously wielded the censorious scalpel? Do not worry that these sinners who are so harsh in their criticisms against the sins of others, will not have their just rewards? Verily, verily, I say unto you, their condemnation will come from God. It is better for us not to try to snatch the divine thunderbolts out of God's hand. Be patient even in your criticisms against those unjust critics. "Let your moderation be known unto all men."

But there is still another class of aggressive critics, against which I would plead with you to apply the teachings of my text. They are those who have no sympathy with you in your work. I do not mean those who are maliciously falsifying, but those who honestly, truthfully and positively do not like your ways of doing things. Now, my brother, the best way for you to overcome such criticism, is not by going out and trying to destroy your neighbor's influence for good, but simply by being patient. By simply saying nothing against your honest though antagonistic neighbors, but by going ahead and doing your own work in your own way, and proving beyond all peradventure, that God has blessed you, and will continue to bless you in what you are doing in his name.

Let me suggest one other overmastering consideration which ought to control all your impatience with others: How much does God bear with from you? When he who is so wise and pure, looks upon you, and sees you more clearly with all your faults than you can see yourself, is it not surprising that he does not give you up? Yet he bears with you and loves you still. Cannot you who owe so much to God's forbearance, bear with the faults of your fellow-men?

Nine-tenths of all the criticisms made against us would soon die, if we ourselves did not go forth to fight those criticisms and thus make matters worse. Hugh Clifford, the old jungle traveler, once vividly described a startling experience he had when traveling in the Malay Peninsula. He and his men were attacked by a huge swarm of angry, revengeful bees. Immediately the party swung their blankets around their heads and tried to fight them off, but it was useless. They were stung on head, arms and legs—they were stung everywhere. "Take to the water!" Clifford cried to his men. The Malays ran for their lives. The bees not only drove them into the water, but continued stinging them there. The furious insects threatened to kill them while they were in the river itself. "With hands like boxing gloves and heads like inflated foot balls from the wrote Clifford, "my half blinded, suffering party then limped away to the next village. Half an hour later one of my men came into the village unmarred. He had seen the bees coming, and had sat down and awaited the assault. They covered him from head to foot, but as he offered no opposition, they did not sting him." What is true of the Malay bees is true also of the human bees. With buzz and threatenings in great swarms they may light upon you. They may crawl all over you; but if you will not fight them, but simply go on doing the work that God has given you to do, your assailants will become harmless, and after a while they will leave you in peace and in ease.

Thus, my friends, the whole teaching of this text is this: Drop your battle-axe, and, as a Christian farmer, go to Gospel seed planting. Drop your war clubs and go to driving an ambulance. Do not boast of how many enemies you have killed, but speak rather of how many friends you have been able to win. Oh, my brother and sister, will you not try to practice Paul's moderation? Will you not let your forbearance and gentleness and Christian forgiveness be known unto all men?

The Salvation Troopers

WITH a fine dash and spiritual enthusiasm, the Salvation Army has sent a flying squadron of cavalry into the Kentucky mountains, to carry the Gospel to the mountaineers. There is in this whole continent no better or more inviting field for a spiritual campaign, and the fervent prayers of God's people everywhere will accompany the Salvation troopers in their gallant work. Colonel Holz and his little band, with the Sword of the Spirit as their sole weapon, have a heroic task before them. These hill-folk, for nearly half a century, have been at feud among themselves, and the lawless spirit has apparently increased with every new generation. Over a score of lives have been sacrificed in the bitter quarrels that have transformed good neighbors into relentless enemies, made of friends and blood-relations implacable foes, and given over the hills and valleys of the Cumberland range to the deadly work of the feud. Breathitt County has achieved in thirty years a fame that has probably no parallel elsewhere in America—the fame of "Bloody Breathitt," where the shotgun and rifle are the supreme law of the land.

But there is a brighter side to the picture. Our investigations have shown these mountain folk to be by nature, kind, hospitable, and generous. They are brave and patriotic. They have been too long neglected, and, in the quick march of progress, they have been left far in the rear. Had they, like others, enjoyed their full share of religious, educational and industrial advantages, they would now have been classed among the progressive and law-abiding. But the mountain life is a hard one, and the mere struggle for existence has been so absorbing that it has well-nigh excluded opportunities of advancement. Thus the present condition of these mountaineers is less their fault than their misfortune. The nation should now turn its attention to this neglected section and help to raise it to the true standard of American manhood. Help it to purge itself of lawlessness; educate it; enlighten it; give it plenty of schools and churches, and we shall soon witness such a transformation as will make the dark record of Breathitt and kindred sections a thing of the past.

May God speed the mission of the Salvation troopers in the Kentucky mountains! And may Commander Booth-Tucker and Pastor Guerrant and every faithful servant of the Master who labors there win many souls for Christ in these mountains, and aid in bringing peace and brotherly love to the places where strife and sorrow have reigned too long.

Jews Again Persecuted

THE recent outbreak of anti-Jewish hatred in Russia adds another to the long list of atrocities perpetrated on that cruelly afflicted people. According to the cable dispatches, the matter of religion had nothing to do with the disturbance. It originated in a trade dispute. The Jewish pedlers of Gomel, a town about five hundred miles south of St. Petersburg, had some fish to sell. They named their price, as the vender everywhere has the right to do. Purchasers in Gomel, however, did not, as purchasers do elsewhere, accept the alternative of buying or not buying at the price named, but despoiled the pedlers forcibly of their stock. The matter might have ended with the loss had the sufferers been of any other race. But being Jews the outrage upon them was applauded, and the populace, seeing that no protection was afforded to the despoiled dealers, conceived the idea that it would be a profitable scheme to rob other Jews. Accordingly stores were broken open and the stocks of the Jews were seized and distributed. The owners attempted to defend their property, but, to their astonishment, they were restrained by the police. The riots continued on the following day, and began to take on a murderous character. Jewish women were set upon whenever they showed themselves upon the streets, and their shrieks, and those of their children who were being stoned and beaten, filled the air. Their husbands and fathers rushed to the rescue, but the police, sympathizing with the assailants, drove the men back into their houses, arresting any who would not obey. The next day there was an organized attack on the Jewish streets. Soldiers were on duty, but in no case did they restrain the rioters, but assaulted the Jews, and in one instance fired on a company of Jews, who, in a side street, had gathered to protect their women and children. All the horrors of Kishineff appeared to be impending, when suddenly, on the morning of the fourth day, a change occurred. New orders from the Government had apparently been received, for the rioting was sternly and quickly suppressed. The grim record of total results was twenty-five Jews killed, one hundred in hospital seriously hurt, and a large number under medical care with less severe wounds. More than three hundred Jewish homes had been stripped and partially destroyed.

Truly a sad and distressing story with many deplorable precedents in that and other countries, in this and former times. It is marvelous how intense is the enmity to this long-suffering people, that not even the advance of civilization is able to eradicate. How literally have the prophecies been fulfilled which warned them that they would become a people "scattered and peeled," a proverb and a hissing in every land. Their persecutors, who disgrace the name of Christians, taunt them with the fact, forgetting that there are prophecies, too, of vengeance on all who do them harm. God has not cast away his people, though his wrath has been heavy on them for long centuries. May the time soon come when their sorrow shall be turned into joy, and all the world obeys the call of the prophet: "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned: for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." That will come when Jew and Gentile join in giving glory to the Son of David and recognizing him as the King of kings.

Answered Prayer

IN the many letters which come to this journal, making public acknowledgment of answers to prayer, there is a reverent and grateful recognition of the Divine goodness in granting the petitions of those who, in their extremity, call upon God for help. These letters are from people in all ranks of life; some from men and women of wealth and culture, and others from those in the humblest circumstances; but all give evidence of a real and abiding faith in the great Christian truth, that, the promise of Jesus—"whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do"—stands as good to-day as when it was made to his disciples, while the Saviour was with them on earth. Regarding the source from which they come, and the absolute truthfulness and sincerity of the writers, these letters constitute indisputable evidence of the prevailing power of believing prayer, offered in Christ's name and in accordance with the Divine will and purpose.

In the spiritual realm there are vast fields of exploration and many strange experiences, but those are for the spiritual-minded alone. To all others they are a sealed mystery, inaccessible and inexplicable. As there are problems in science which cannot be made intelligible to the uncultured lay mind, so there are experiences in religion, which none but those who see with the eye of faith, and who have laid hold of eternal things, can comprehend. Yet, most marvelous of all, they can be understood and experienced by the simplest souls, if these souls are in union with God through Christ and living the life of faith. This condition of spiritual union and harmony is to the heavenly contact, through prayer, what in the realm of natural science the harmonious adjustment and vibration of two instruments far apart are to the modern miracle of wireless telegraphy. Christ, the Intercessor, the Mediator, the Advocate, is the ever-living though invisible link that unites the believer on earth with the throne above.

Among the Workers

—IRA D. SANKEY, the famous evangelist, who is now totally blind, is again living in Brooklyn. He occasionally sings in the evenings some of the old hymns that he has sung to great audiences throughout the world. He is very cheerful, despite his affliction, and says to his friends, "All is well with me and the road is bright."

The Little Girl who "Had Nothin'"

AMONG the children who were being examined to ascertain their fitness to be the guests of the Fresh-Air Home, was a very poor little girl in a faded, ragged gown. Her face was thin and pale.

"Have you a father?" she was asked.

"No," replied the child.

"Have you a mother?"

"No."

"Did you ever see the country?"

"No," came the timid answer.

"Did you ever see green grass?"

"Yes, in the park."

"Have you ever seen a daisy?"

"No, mum; I don't know what a daisy is," with an innocent look.

"Have you brothers or sisters?"

"No; I haven't nothin', an' I never had nothin'. Oh, I know I can't go to the country," said the poor little creature now sobbing bitterly.

"You are the very one that the Fresh-Air Fund is for," was the comforting assurance. "It is expressly for such as you. You shall go to the country; you shall head the procession. The Fresh-Air Home is just for those who have nothing."

And so it is with the free salvation offered in the Gospel. It is for those who "have nothing." Christ gives a free passage to the Home he has gone to prepare. All the fitness he requires is to feel your need of him. If you feel that you "have nothing," "Come buy wine and milk" and Gospel grace, without money and without price. The poorest, the most needy can come to the blessed Saviour, who gave his life to purchase salvation for all who would accept it.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fresh-Air Home at Mont Lawn, in the summer just ended, has received, fed, sheltered and cared for nearly 2,000 little tenement boys and girls. A very large proportion of these, like the little one in the foregoing beautiful story from real life, "had nothin'." They were the right kind of children to send to the Home—children whose lives are sunless and joyless; who, if they ever reach manhood and womanhood, must do so only through hard stress and struggle. These are the children whom our kind and generous readers have helped to a holiday this year.

Reader, don't you want a share in this blessed work among the children of the poor? If you do, send us your contribution ($3) to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fresh-Air Fund, and thus provide an outing for a little boy or girl when the Home reopens, or you might endow a cot for the coming season at a cost of $21. Now is the time to make sure that you will have representation in the work, and that some poor, needy little waif will be provided for through your generosity.

"If"

If I could visit but one city in the world, it would be Rome.

If I could call but one back from heaven, for one hour's talk, it would be my mother.

If I could preach but one more sermon, it would be on Christ saving sinners.

If I could have but one prayer answered, it would be, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done."

If I could live but one more day, I would spend the hours "doing good," like Him.

If I could hear but one more sermon, I would select a preacher filled with the Holy Ghost.

If I could read but one more book, it would be the Gospel by John.

If I could hear but one more solo, it would be "The Holy City."

If I could hear but one more chorus, it would be the "Hallelujah," from the Messiah.

If I could have but one more meal, it would be plain food, well cooked and nicely served.

If I could have but one more ride, it would be with friends through the woods and over the hills.

If I could have but one wish granted, it would be "the secret of my heart."

If I could buy but one more thing, it would be a toy for a child.

If I could comfort one more soul, it would be an orphan.

If I could have but one more flower, it would be a Marechal Niel rose.

If I could give but one more dollar, it would be for missions.

If I could hear but one more sentence, it would be, "I love you."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

To Visit King Menelik

OUR consul at Marseilles, Mr. R. P. Skinner, is about to go on a visit to Menelik, King of Abyssinia. A gunboat, probably the Machias, will carry him to the port of Jibuti, and from hence, with a guard of honor of sixteen men from the American squadron, he will proceed to Antoto, the king's favorite place of residence, which has superseded Gondar as the capital. The object of the visit has not been officially stated, but there is little doubt of the correctness of the general assumption that Mr. Skinner is going to arrange a treaty of commerce with the King. The port of Marseilles, at which Mr. Skinner is stationed, is used by ships trading with Abyssinia, and it was probably the spectacle of these vessels, carrying French and German products to the Abyssinian markets, which suggested to him the advantage of securing for the United States a share of the trade. At present the chief concessions are in the hands of a French firm, but that arrangement has only five years to run, and Mr. Skinner is taking time by the forelock. The population of Abyssinia is estimated at four millions. The products they are likely to buy from us at first will probably be cotton goods and petroleum, but as they are an agricultural people and are using the most primitive implements, it is believed that the time cannot be far distant when there will be a demand for American machinery. They can supply in return ivory, hides, coffee and gold. Of late years the civil wars, which for a long period had desolated the country, have ceased, and the people have devoted themselves to peaceable pursuits. This is due chiefly to the wise administration of King Menelik and his Queen, who have, by skilful diplomacy, gradually concentrated in their own hands the power formerly exercised by rival chiefs. The loyalty these chiefs now display toward Menelik was clearly shown in 1896, when the King took the field against Italy and won the decisive battle of Adowah. He captured the enemy's guns and has taught his troops how to use them, so that he is now, with his united army of more than 100,000 men, a formidable antagonist for a rival to meet. He boasts of his ancient lineage, which he claims that he can trace to King Solomon, who, he declares, was married to the Queen of Sheba, who included Abyssinia in her territories. If the mission of our consul to this remarkable monarch is successful, and a market is opened for our commodities in his country, it may be hoped that the churches will avail themselves of the opportunity to send the Gospel thither, too. We may hope, also, that, as does not always happen when civilized man trades with the uncivilized, the conduct of the trader may not arouse prejudice against the preaching of the missionary. The appeal of Nehemiah ought to be ever kept in mind by the merchant:

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God, because of the reproach of the heathen (Nehemiah 5:9).

THE BODY-GUARD OF THE KING OF ABYSSINIA

SOLDIERY AND PEASANTS OF ABYSSINIA

The Anarchy in Macedonia

Continued reports come from the disturbed districts of Macedonia of burned villages, brutal massacres, and wholesale murder. The Bulgarian Government has appealed to the Powers who signed the treaty of Berlin, which left Macedonia at the mercy of the Turk, calling their attention to the atrocities being committed on the Christians, but it has evoked only a discouraging response. A manifesto has been issued by the Russian Government, apparently with the approval of the other Powers, warning Bulgaria against interference. The manifesto sets forth that the Sultan accepted in good faith the scheme of reform suggested by Russia and Austria, and was proceeding to execute it, when the rising in Macedonia frustrated the scheme. In the presence of the armed rising, it is contended, the Sultan could not proceed with his reforms. It is also hinted that Bulgaria has encouraged the revolution and connived at her own people crossing the frontier to aid the insurgents. Prince Ferdinand, therefore, is in an awkward dilemma. If he refuses to continue his support of the Macedonian Committee, his own subjects may rise in rebellion against him; if, on the other hand, he openly or secretly opposes the Turk, the Sultan, as his suzerain, may send an army into Bulgaria. In the meantime the sanguinary conflict continues, and the Macedonian Committee declares that it will go on until Macedonia is set free from Turkish domination. It has no confidence in the Sultan's reforms, and refuses to be satisfied with any other solution of the problem than complete deliverance from the Turkish yoke. That deliverance might have come before now, if the Macedonians had refrained from themselves committing outrages. They have alienated to a large extent the sympathy of Europe, by their own conduct, which creates the suspicion that they are not fitted for self-government. They would have achieved their ends more easily if they had followed the Apostle's advice:

Submit yourself to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake . . . . for so is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men (1 Peter 2:13, 15).

One Thousand Dollars for a Life

Disclosures occasionally made to the police of New York show that the tyranny of the Mafia and other Italian societies is no myth, but an organized system of blackmail. Unhappily, the complainants generally lose courage after making the first charge and will not aid in securing the conviction of the offenders. Fear of the vengeance of the dreaded society is of course the cause of the practical withdrawal of the prosecution, and as a recent murder of an ex-Italian policeman proves it is not baseless. The latest instance is that of an Italian contractor in Brooklyn, who is known to have acquired considerable wealth. Three weeks ago he received a letter from a man posing as the agent of the society, directing him to go to a certain street corner in a lonely part of the city, and to wait there until he was accosted by a man who would give him a certain password. The penalty of disobedience or of notifying the police of the demand was death. The contractor did not obey, and the following week a second letter was sent reminding him of the former demand and fixing another rendezvous at which he was ordered to present himself on a certain night. The penalty in the event of failure was to be his own death, and the dynamiting of his house. The man, now really alarmed, kept the appointment, and was told that unless he paid $10,000 to the society he would be murdered. He protested that he was unable to produce so large a sum, and finally arranged for a week's reprieve by paying $1,000. At the end of the week another demand was made, and then the victim informed the police. A plan was arranged to entrap the blackmailers and four men were arrested. It may be hoped that if they are the guilty persons, they will be severely punished. It is hard that in a free country a man should have to pay to avoid being murdered. It is not surprising that he should pay if he believed that otherwise his life would be sacrificed. Almost any man would give all he has for his life. The surprising thing is that when eternal life is offered as a free gift so few should avail themselves of the offer.

Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life (John 5:40).

Lost in the Fog

The passengers on a steamer going from Bridgeport, Conn., to Greenwich a few days ago, had an alarming experience. After leaving Bridgeport the vessel ran into a fog bank off Norwalk. The fog was very thick, and the captain felt his way along at reduced speed for half an hour or more, trusting that the fog would lift. Suddenly the ringing of a fog-bell was heard hard by and the engines were stopped. To the dismay of the captain, he found his vessel was close to the bell buoy off Lloyds Neck on the Long Island shore and in the path of Boston Steamers. A passing schooner was hailed from which the steamer got bearings for the proper course. It was found that the boat's compass was not working properly, due doubtless to the two steel fire-engines on board which had fouled it. There was some excitement among the passengers when they learned that they were lost in the Sound, but soon matters were straightened out, and the fog having cleared, the vessel reached her dock in safety. In the voyage of life the end of such a trouble is not always so happy. When a man carries in his bosom idolatries or sins that disturb the compass by which he ought to be guided, wreck is often the result.

Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life (Prov. 4:23).

THE STORY OF "CHRISTODORA HOUSE

A Young Women's Settlement, and the Remarkable Work it is Doing Among New York Children

THE CHRISTODORA "STEADFAST CLUB" IN BRONX PARK, NEW YORK

CHRISTODORA House, which is located at No. 147 Avenue B, New York City, is, to put it briefly, reaching out in the sanest, most sensible, practical way, for the expression of the rounded life, in which success does not mean money, but faithfulness in good work; in which knowledge does not greatly count, except as it serves in helpfulness; and in which religion is not a matter of creed or ceremony, apart from either work or play, but the strengthening hourly consciousness, that, as its little children sing:

Night and day our Father's near—
God sees! God sees!

Nor is its aim that even this thought should be for anyone's self alone. Through their clubs, all variations of race, religion, and ability, learn the art of living together under the watchword, that is "ours" in the fullest sense. There must be over a thousand who come into touch with one or another of its relations, and that there are not as many more is simply due to lack of room and equipment. Over and over again, new groups of young people from the neighborhood apply to be taken in as a new club, but must be refused, only because there is no room in which they could meet on any night in the week; and existing clubs have already stretched as far as possible the membership limits.

CHRISTODORA HOUSE

The tiny tots of from five to eight years old belong to the Button Club, and help their mothers by learning to be helpful about the little things. They can tell you, too, wholesome little rhymes like the story of the "wobin" who fell into such serious trouble because of his hasty belief that "old folks don't know ev'wyfing!" Little girls of from eight to ten in the Steadfast Club are learning to sew, to sing, and most of all, to remember that "he that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much."

Over a hundred girls of from ten to fourteen belong to the Sunshine Club. They help the House in a special way by sending a committee to lead the games of the play hour, and to see that everyone who comes has a good time. Every Saturday morning, and nearly every day during vacation, the big basement room is open to all the little ones who care to come in to play or to look at the picture books, "and make all the noise we want to, so long as the doors are shut." Most members of this club are still school-girls, and hold their weekly meeting on Saturday afternoon, but the urgent need of help at home is already forcing their older members into business life. These little workers do not even then give up their club, but as they must meet in the evening instead of with the others, they call themselves "the business Sunshiners." Somewhat older girls who, like these, are already at work in different positions, are the members of the Fidelity and Larcom Clubs, co-operating for the development of orderliness, "for the strengthening of character and of Club spirit."

The boys of the neighborhood, too, are an active part of the House, through clubs known as the Young Americans, Citizens, the Young Heroes, the Patriots, and the Social Club. Among the objects of these are, "the development of true manhood and faithfulness to our country;" "for improvement and for friendship," etc.

The helpful parts played by the young men of the Musical and Dramatic, or the Lawrence Athletic Clubs; by the young women of the Sangster, Clionian and Loyalty Clubs, are too varied to be easily described. Some are among the charter members of the House, working out its standards and spreading them through their intimate knowledge of the neighborhood conditions as the wisest friends of the House from outside could not possibly do, and with a loyalty to it which is at once its inspiration and the earnest of its success.

These clubs are, of course, the most obvious activities of the House; but there are a hundred other ways of co-operation. There are the regular office hours of its physician. In the winter there are classes of a dozen different kinds—millinery, dressmaking, stenography, typewriting, musical training, the use of the piano, violin or voice and chorus work, the English subjects and others in which any club members may feel the worth of a better equipment. There are also the library in daily use, and the Savings Bank. Every Sunday, those of the older girls who desire to do so come in for the simple, straightforward Gospel meeting in the afternoon, and in the evening the Children's Hour at sunset gives to the younger ones another helpful service of Bible verses (how even the smallest of them know their Psalms!), singing, and a little talk that they can carry in even a child's heedless memory through the we to follow. At other times th is systematic Bible study in O Testament History, or in t Life of Christ, as any may ele

But none of these thin move of themselves; Clu must have advisers, and classe teachers; holiday cottages do not run automatically, a a hundred details in as many directions need constant s pervision.

Each brings a finely-trained special equipme to the direction of some one of the varied forms of wo in the departments of general education, of musical trai ing, of special study of the Bible, or to the executi management of industrial classes and the widely differe clubs.

SPREADING THE GOSPEL IN JAPAN

WHEN it was learned that a National Exposition was to be held at Osaka from March 1 to July 31 last, the missionaries of that city and vicinity met and arranged for a continuous Christian campaign during the whole period. For this purpose a suitable building was secured immediately in front of the main entrance, and consecutive services were held nearly the whole day.

Over the building was fixed a large sign-board, on which was written in large Japanese characters, "Come and see." On the ground floor was the hall for preaching, a room for the sale of Bibles and Christian literature; and in the second story, rooms for the accommodation of the workers. The various missions were divided into five groups; and each of these in succession took charge of the services for a period of about two weeks at a time. In this way an efficient corps of workers was secured for the whole period, the expense and labor suitably divided, and at the same time it was manifest to the world that the same spirit animates all who are engaged in the extension of Christ's kingdom in Japan.

The result of these services has been very gratifying. In spite of the other and great attractions there were successive audiences o eager listeners from ten o'clock ir the morning until nine at night The total attendance was found by actual count to have been 246, 665. Of this number 16,222 gave their names as inquirers.

Owing to a municipal regulation that no gathering of the people was to be allowed on the street, the sale of Scriptures was very much restricted. But in spite of such a hindrance, the work was carried on during the whole time. The sales were 90 Bibles, 8,240 Testaments, and 6,090 Portions, making a total of 14,420 volumes. This was accomplished by the faithful labors of Mr. A. Lawrence, assisted by a corps of native helpers.

The fifteenth session of the Young Men's Christian Association for Japan, was held at Arim, from July 17 to 26. The number enrolled in the Japanese section was 182. One year ago there were 150. All parts of the country were represented. Among the delegates there were twenty-eight students from the seven higher schools and the two Imperial Universities. While the greater number were students, there were also 25 delegates from the city associations, and 30 pastors. H. LOOMIS.

Our Household Circle

THE LOVE THAT LASTS

THE season of weddings is at hand. Though every part of the swiftly moving year has its chime of marriage bells, yet October is the month most highly favored by brides, and the pomp of early autumn lends itself most graciously to the processional march that leads to the altar.

Notwithstanding the fact that easy divorce is the shame and disgrace of our country, happily and steadfastly, loyal marriages are the rule, and the exceptions only emphasize its well-nigh universal scope and reign. The wide land over, cheerful and loving home life prevails. Men go to their work in the morning and come home at night, to the dear ones, and women and children dwell in peaceful security under roofs that are unwarked by fidelity and affection. We need never fear for the stability of the republic while far from our congested towns, in rural neighborhoods, in little villages, in quiet farmsteads, husbands and wives live in mutual confidence and the security of reciprocal understanding, and a trust that admits neither suspicion nor doubt. Jealousy, which eats like corroding rust into the fabric circlet of the wedding ring, is the foe of home happiness, but it is the exception, not the rule.

In the glow of the bridal hour, it never seems possible to either of the contracting parties, that anything shall exist so much as a transient shadow on their felicity. Each honestly thinks the other perfect. Each tries to yield to the other, finding delight in small sacrifices, and anticipating every unspoken wish, with eager zest, each hastens to brim with some new surprise of gladness the other's cup of blessing.

From this high plane of exalted idealism, there is often a decline to lower levels in the commonplaces of every-day existence. When the honeymoon is over, the bride and the groom of necessity lay aside, half unconsciously, whatever of company manners they wore, and appear in their own proper characters. One may be sometimes unreasonable. The other may be irritable. Either may be occasionally hasty, and say sharp words soon regretted. Now comes the testing time of the love that lasts.

Passion may wane. It is the mere efflorescence of true love, that if it be of the right and noble kind, grows deeper with the years. Says Emerson, pithily,

> A ruddy drop of manly blood
> The surging sea outweighs;
> The world uncertain comes and goes,
> The lover rooted stays.

Old husbands and wives, by a thousand little threadlets of daily communion, a thousand unconsidered acts of imitation, grown more and more similar and more and more intimate, actually come to look alike. The same expression animates the two dear old faces, that in youth were in contrast of line, shape and color. The love that lasts transfigures and illumines our clay and makes it half divine.

Let the young people who shall be married in the coming autumn days, beware of the first quarrel.

> It is the little rift within the lute
> That by and by shall make the music mute.

No difference of opinion should cause friction. Two grown persons, brought up in opposite environments, may not always reach identical conclusions at once, but sensible married couples may now and then agree to differ. A good plan is never to let the day end in controversy. If there is need of pardon asked and granted, let it be done before night draws its curtain round the home. Where there is never a first downright quarrel, with its sequence of heartache, there will never be a second.

Yet unbroken harmony may approximate stagnation. Where two love one another, the monotony of the days may be diversified by little contests of wit, and little passages at arms, which mean nothing but kindness, and add spice to the daily brew. The love that lasts is of sterling stuff. It does not go to pieces because the sea is not as smooth as a mill-pond. Given, entire confidence, congenial tempers, a common creed, decent self-restraint on both sides, and a due degree of demonstration, the tenderness and beauty of marriage will weaken every gale. There are those who kill love by fault-finding, or freeze it by cold indifference, or stab it by infidelity. God pity them and forgive their folly! But God be praised, they are in the minority. The great majority drinks a cup that is honey-sweet, to the last drop in the end of life.

ON A HOLIDAY

See the little country children,
Coming with their banners gay.
With their rosy cheeks advancing
And their bright eyes shining, dancing,
They will march in proud array.
Fun is theirs, as they are keeping
Happy fete and gala day.
—M. E. S.

The Perfect Guest

IF the hostess be the party of the first part, the guest is the party of the second part. Unless a guest brings a sort of passport with her from the home that receives and entertains her, she may be unwelcome at home.

One of the chief ingredients of the perfect guest may go when she is expected, not to change her point in the universe, and write or telegraph that she cannot come. Many women are extremely thoughtless in this respect, and send indecision pierce very quivering to the heart of the maiden made ready for their arrival. For example, a lady may have arranged for the dressmaker, and have set aside a week for her exclusive use, and, not thoughtfully guessing would that she cannot come this week, but will the next, considers and that functionary. Or, when one has a number of friends, plans may be made for weeks ahead, and the person who heedlessly fails out sets them wrong. A hostess may be apt to arrange a charming outing, or the artist in question may be to secure tickets to this or that interesting entertainment for the coming guest. Suppose the guest fails out at the last moment. The embarrassment and annoyance are very great. Whether the accepted invitation be for a meal, a night, or a week, the guest should take pains to appear when and where (to speak of invited to arrive. This is the minimum of what should be a matter of conscience.

Next, the perfect guest, finding the room in disorder and dainty order, keeps it so. To the neat housewife her home in the care of her mother is a trial to have her spare chamber occupied by her friend, seem as if it had been visited by a cyclone. Young girls are the greatest sinners in this particular. They throw their things about, disfigure chairs, drapery and shelves, and, reckless the canons of good taste by arranging on the outer of the home that shelters them. Unconsciously, they do worse than this, when they spoil mantels or polished surfaces, or scatter spatters of ink on bureau and table covers.

A guest conforms to the hours for meals, and is ready on the instant that breakfast or dinner is announced. She is a perfect guest. Where the mind of the hostess is burdened about punctuality, he knows and names it a guest to verify, and whether or not he is disturbed, or his wife distressed at the tardiness of guests, the kitchen is sure to be agitated. Least should be served when it is ready. No polite guest comes late to any meal if she can avoid it.

The agreeable guest is pleased with everything and especially interested in meeting the neighbors and friends of her hostess. She is glad they call, since that is a pleasure to her, to entertain at the company and sometimes for as she can, without undue entertainment her business may make. Then if she is musical she does not refuse to play and sing, if she be a good talker, she does not sit in silence, but keeps the conversational shuttle flying, bringing out her best stories for the amusement of her listeners, and proving herself social to touch with them.

It is an essential to a visit's success, that it be not prolonged beyond the point originally intended. The most delightful guest may stay too long, and there comes a time when "Wont out her welcome." When the time set for the departure is reached, the guest is wise to take leave even though urged to remain. She will be regretted, and the memory made by her loss will be tribute to her powers of pleasing.

Guests have been known to linger until the hostess has been inconvenienced by their leaving. No sound from is worse than this, and the perfect guest never strikes into it.

White Lies

Are there any? Is the least evasion in the style most tolerable of evasions? Perhaps some of those conventionalities, such as ellipses we welcome of a person from [illegible] saving you are not at home, when you are in the house, or pretending to have a headache, when you are [illegible] an inconvenient invitation are all right. The fact is that are wholly wrong. A white lie, as such a [illegible] and the souring as thin and worn as any worn. To [illegible] sight, every [illegible] as its father, the devil, who has been a liar from the beginning.

CHILDREN'S SERVICE

THERE'S always work in plenty for little hands to do,
Something waiting every day that none may try but you.
Little burdens that you may lift, little steps that you can take,
Heavy hearts that you may comfort for the blessed Saviour's sake.

There's room for children's service in this busy world of ours
We need them as we need the birds and need the summer flowers,
And their help at task and toiling the church of God may claim,
And rally little followers in Christ's most Holy Name.

There are words for little lips, sweetest words of hope and cheer,
They will have the spell of melody for many a tired ear;
Don't you wish your gentle words might point some souls above,
Finding rest and peace and guidance in the dear Redeemer's love.

There are orders meant for you. Swift and jubilant they ring,
O the bliss of being trusted with the errands of the King!
March unfearing in the service, not an evil can befall
Those who do his gracious bidding, hasting at the Master's call.

Our Great Encyclopedia Offer

A New Work Never Before Printed

Everything Absolutely New

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is not an old work brought down to date by the patching up of old plates, but is an absolutely new production, just completed from new plates made from new type, and never before printed from. It contains the very latest information on every subject that can engage the human mind. Undertaken for the express purpose of providing the best Encyclopedia ever published, the Editor and his three hundred specialists have spared neither pains nor expense to carry out the trust with which they were commissioned.

The Best Work of its Kind

Each one of the 75,000 subjects handled have been carefully and scientifically considered, and treated as though the reputation of the entire work depended on that particular article. Hence we have a work more thorough, more comprehensive, more intelligible, even to the untutored mind, than dozens of more pretentious and infinitely more expensive productions.

Just Published A. D. 1903

As a Universal Educator, THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is absolutely unsurpassed. It is a great compendium of all human knowledge, whether pertaining to History, Science, Art, Invention, Geography, Biography, Literature, Commerce, Manufacture, or any other subject. It takes in the whole range, and affords, in the most accessible shape, all the light available to the most careful research, and highest expert authority.

It is very important that the reader bear in mind that this is a New Work, and hence, though an Encyclopedia may already enrich his library, this latest production is nevertheless necessary, in order that he may be posted up to date. An old encyclopedia, set ten or twenty years ago, with a few statistics doctored up to make them current—though bound in genuine Turkey Morocco, or Russia—is still an old work of reference, and affords no later information on science, invention, wars, or the recent events of importance than was contained in the manuscript when first written, twenty or more years ago.

Twentieth Century Information

The Scholar, the Student, the Professional Man, the Banker, the Merchant, the Mechanic, the Laborer, the Housekeeper, the Mother, the Wife, require up-to-date information. The ideas of the last decade will not apply to-day. Things have changed, progress has been made, and an Encyclopedia of the Nineteenth Century is as antiquated in the Twentieth Century as the summer's fashions of 1880 differ from those of 1903.

Contains Most Recent Subjects

Just think of getting your information about Cuba, Philippines, Electricity, Motors, Automobiles, Klondike, South Africa, The Hague Tribunal, and other modern subjects, from a work compiled in 1880, or even before. Surely a few statistical alterations concerning Population, Exports, Imports, etc., will throw no additional light on current matters which interest the great human family far more than mere recent additions to Population, or immaterial changes in the extent of our Commerce. THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA is a work of To-day, and handles every subject from the view-point of 1903, and, indeed, many things look quite differently to us now than they did twenty years or more ago.

No Patched-Up Plates

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA throws a new light on the affairs of the world. It has a new view-point. The world has made wonderful progress in every direction. It does not stand still in the matters of Invention, Commerce, Art, Literature, Manufactures and Science, while statistics change, but its progress is in all directions, and some things that are perfection to-day were not even thought of ten years ago. Hence Encyclopedic knowledge is ever changing and ever advancing. We live in a busy, bustling, active age, and a year of the present is equal to a decade a quarter of a century ago. Surely the old Encyclopedias, with doctored statistics, do not and cannot satisfy the demand for up-to-date information.

Twelve Mammoth Volumes

The publishers of THE TWENTIETH CENTURY WORLD-WIDE ENCYCLOPEDIA realized this fact, and therefore they had a new work prepared, newly written, newly set, and newly printed. And it is this great work, the result of the most modern research, that we here offer in twelve mammoth volumes of over 700 pages each, with maps of every country and state, beautifully printed, and with many superb half-tone full page inserts, illustrating the progress of the world in all its various and exceedingly interesting phases, all attractively and substantially bound in high grade cloth and genuine gold.

After · Forgiveness, · Faithfulness ✳ DAVID'S CONFESSION

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 18
PSALM 51

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT -- PSALM 51: 10:
"CREATE IN ME A CLEAN HEART"

KING DAVID had done wickedly before God and man. He had broken the tenth, the seventh, and the sixth commandments. He had coveted Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah; he had committed adultery with her; he had also planned successfully the death of Uriah, the husband of Bathsheba, by sending him out to battle, with instructions to his commander that he should be put in the forefront of the battle, and suddenly left alone by a temporary retreat, in order that he might be killed by the opposing foe. Thus he was murdered. After this David took Bathsheba to his own house as his wife. Nathan, God's prophet, faithfully rebuked King David for his double crime. And so wisely was it done, in an allegory, that David pronounced his own condemnation. Nathan brought before David the case of a man, rich in herds, who, when he wanted a lamb to entertain a guest, confiscated a poor man's one pet lamb. Nathan expatiated on how the lamb had grown up with the poor man and his children, and had eaten out of their hands, and drank out of their cups, and had been almost as a child in the family. David, in righteous anger, pronounced a death sentence upon the rich man who had taken the poor man's lamb. Let us imagine the dismay of David when Nathan looked him straight in the eye, and pointing his finger at him said: "Thou art the man."

David was bowed down with a sense of his sin. And the son which the wife of Uriah had borne him was smitten of the Lord and died. What David suffered in remorse for the sins he had committed we learn in the Psalm of our lesson. In it he seeks God's forgiveness. He prays that he may be cleansed thoroughly, and created anew by the Holy Spirit; he would have his soiled life made whiter than snow. Then he burst into a song of praise to the Lord for his mercy, and proposes to become a preacher of righteousness, and teach transgressors God's ways. Forgiveness leads to faithfulness.

"AND NATHAN SAID TO DAVID, THOU ART THE MAN"

Illustration and Application

1. The sin. Few in our Sunday Schools are tempted to murder, but the sin of uncleanness, which in David's case led to murder, and which God counts as deserving equal punishment, is the most universal of all temptations, and comes to every youth when as yet there is almost no attraction to the saloon or to gambling. Temptation to this sin comes from billboards and shows, from shop windows and low conversation, most of all from street roving at night. Teachers should therefore be faithful in warning, even though the subject is distasteful, and supplement these personal appeals by united street cleaning. Much should be done on the line of Gladstone's great saying, that it is the purpose of law to make it as hard as possible to do wrong, and as easy as possible to do right; but even without resort to law, or before it, conditions can and should be improved by what Frances E. Willard used to call "the arrest of thought." A kindly protest often stops a wrong, especially when it is also illegal. In such cases it is often found that a word even to the unwise is sufficient.

Not alone for uncleanness, but for all sins, do we need to adopt David's prayer of penitence, for every sin against our great God is a great sin.

2. The faithful rebuke. John McNeil tells of a British officer in India, who had been living an impure life, and went round to the chaplain to argue religion with him. During their talk, the officer said: "Religion is all very well, but you must admit there are difficulties—about the miracles, for instance." The chaplain knew the man, and his habits, his besetting sin, and quietly looking him in the face, answered him: "Yes, there are some things, I'll admit, in the Bible, that are not very plain, but the seventh commandment is very plain." The thrust went home. How absurdly men think their sins are hidden! In the reign of George II., a West Indian merchant ship, the Cuba, appeared one summer evening in the Solent. Her cargo consisted solely of Havana tobacco, and well her captain knew with what extreme quickness and secrecy it must be landed towards nightfall, and consigned to the English smuggling company that anxiously awaited it at Portsmouth. In those days, the punishment for smuggling was death. Meanwhile, however, a vigilant coast-guardsman had sighted the Cuba's too familiar sails, and communicated with His Majesty's ironclad Thunderer. Immediately the Thunderer started to take the suspected vessel prisoner. "Steer back to the channel!" shouted the Cuba's captain to his terrified crew, observing his powerful and rapid pursuer; "Throw the tobacco bales overboard. Not a minute to lose! At any cost, let us save our lives!" So, in quite a panic of haste, bale after bale was pitched into the water. But imagine the poor captain's confusion to see that the tobacco floated, and that, therefore, not a single bale could be hidden. They all kept in sight, huge black masses in the bright moonlight upon the blue sea, the Thunderer already in their very wake! So, when a man seeks to hide his sins, he does not usually succeed in hiding them even from men, much less from God. And, about the worst of all, is that he cannot hide them from himself.

3. The punishment. When God smote the child of David's sin with death, it was one of God's cruel kindnesses, as a story of a Montana stage will aptly illustrate. A mother and her infant child were the only passengers. A sudden change of weather subjected the woman to more exposure than she was provided for, and before the journey was half over, the freezing cold had begun to creep into her blood. She could protect her babe, but her own life was in danger. As soon as the driver knew how severely she was suffering, he gave her all his extra wraps, and quickened the pace of his team as much as possible, hoping to reach warmth and refuge before her condition became serious. His passenger's welfare was now his only thought, and by frequent inquiries he sought to assure himself of her safety. But the fatal drowsiness had stolen over her, and when no answers were returned to his questions, he stopped and tore open the coach door. The woman's head was swaying from side to side. Instantly he took the babe from her, and bestowed it as comfortably as he could in a furry bundle under the shelter of the seat; then, seizing the mother roughly by the arm, he dragged her upon the frozen ground. His violence only partly awakened her, but when he banged the door together and sprang to his box and drove on, leaving her in the road, she came fully to her senses and began to scream. The driver looked back and saw her madly running after him, crying, "My baby, my baby! Oh, my baby!" The horror of her loss made her forget the cold. By and by, when certain she had warmed her blood into healthy circulation, the driver slackened the speed of his horses, and allowed her to overtake him and resume her place in the coach, with her living and unharmed child. Was the man cruel? That mother did not say so when she knew—knew that he had aroused her and brought her back to life. He had done as God does sometimes to shake us out of soul-lethargy and moral sleep.

Not alone in the loss of his child, but in his own remorse also, David found that suffering is the natural fruit of sin.

4. The repentance. I acknowedge my transgression. Frank and full confession of sin to God, there can be no true repentance without that, but "repentance completed is sorrow converted into action," an actual turning from sin. Whoso confesseth and forsaketh shall find mercy. A mother told her little daughter not to eat certain bonbons left in the room. Coming in a few hours later she found the child, but no vestige of the bonbons. Beginning to question her, the little girl interrupted, "Yes, mamma, I ate them, but I kept asking Jesus to forgive me all the time I was doing it, so it's all right, and you needn't punish me." Are there not "children" of a larger growth whose conduct is often like this which the little girl so naively acknowledged? There are so many things which we know we ought not to do, and yet which tempt us so strongly that we yield, relying upon the repentant feelings sure to follow, and the prayer for forgiveness to excuse the wrongdoing. Such an easy-going repentance is "contempt of court," contempt of God, and constitutes the "presumptuous sin" from which David so earnestly prayed to be delivered.

Let us turn to an illustration of true repentance with restitution. "For some reason I cannot pray; the heavens seem like brass; I go through the form of devotion in private, and, as you know, I take part in public Christian work, but there is no joy or peace in my life; what shall I do?" Thus spoke a member of a Y. M. C. A. religious work committee, and a leader in the young people's society of his church, to a state Y. M. C. A. secretary, who replied, "There must be something in your life which has broken communion; make a clean breast of it, and put it out of your life." After a few moments the young man replied: "Well, when I was a boy, I beat a man out of two dollars. What shall I do?" "Do, there is nothing to do but send him the amount with interest to date; that's the easiest thing, for you are a man with a salary, and to raise that small amount of money is no trouble. What you want to do is to confess the thing, thus giving your pride a stab." After meditation he said he would write, and send the money with interest. At the next service he attended, his face was shining with joy. That young man graduated in one of the Virginia colleges the next year, and entered the ministry. The real turning point in his life was his confession of sin.

The most hardened sinner, with true repentance, may come to God with assurance of a welcome. In a fisherman's hut, in the extreme northeast of Scotland, is a picture of our Saviour, and the fisherman thus tells its story: "I was way down with the drink," he said, "when one night I went into a 'public,' and there hung this picture. I was sober then, and I said to the bartender: 'Sell me that picture; this is no place for the Saviour.' I gave him all the money I had for it, and took it home. Then, as I looked at it, the words of my mother came back to me. I dropped on my knees and cried: 'O Lord Jesus, will you pick me up again and take me out of my sin?' No such prayer is ever unanswered. To-day that fisherman is the grandest man in that little Scotch village.

5. After forgiveness, faithfulness. Then shall I teach transgressors thy ways. Many forget, soon after forgiveness, that they were "saved to serve." In 1897, Dr. Grenfell was in Boston. Mr. Moody was holding meetings in Tremont Temple at the time. Dr. Grenfell sought him out at his hotel, and told Mr. Moody he owed his conversion to him fourteen years before. "What have you been doing since?" was Mr. Moody's immediate question. The oak pulpit in the Seaman's Church, at Sunderland, England, is built of wood in the shape of a boat's bow, and bears on the gunwale, in letters of gold, the inscription, "Nevertheless, at thy word I will let down the net." The pulpit was the gift of the officers and men of a flotilla of torpedo boat destroyers, in acknowledgment of kindness received at Sunderland during a visit there from Dr. Grenfell in the spring of 1901. Not ministers only, but every forgiven soul should be a fisher of men.

A minister was called to the bedside of a dying man. "What did you wish with me?" "I want some comfort, some assurance that I am going to heaven." "You are a member of the church are you not?" "Yes, I am a member of the church, but my faithfulness there is not a recommendation." "You loved the Lord, did you not?" "I used to say I did, but now, when I look back over so many neglected opportunities, I am not sure that I can truthfully say I did." "Well, you are a child of God?" "Yes that is what you preach, but why did I not love the brethren more and do more for them, if I am a child of his? Why was I so indifferent to all Christian work? I used to say that I was a member of the church, but that does not comfort me now. I had no heart in the work. I was too selfish and inconsiderate. I used to say all men were children of God, but now, as I stand face to face with him, I am ashamed to say it. I manufactured so many excuses, and now these excuses stand like mountains between me and heaven."

The Rescue of Buck*

FROM every hill slope came the trickle of running water, the music of unseen fountains. All things were thawing, bending, snapping. The Yukon was straining to break loose the ice that bound it down. It ate away from beneath; the sun ate from above. Air-holes formed, fissures sprang and spread apart, while thin sections of ice fell through bodily into the river. And amid all this bursting, rending, throbbing of awakening life, under the blazing sun and through the soft-sighing breezes, like wayfarers to death, staggered the two men, the woman, and the huskies.

With the dogs falling, Mercedes weeping and riding, Hal swearing innocuously, and Charles' eyes wistfully watering, they staggered into John Thornton's camp at the mouth of White River. When they halted, the dogs dropped down as though they had all been struck dead. Mercedes dried her eyes and looked at John Thornton. Charles sat down on a log to rest. He sat down very slowly and painstakingly what of his great stiffness. Hal did the talking. John Thornton was whittling the last touches on an axe-handle he had made from a stick of birch. He whittled and listened, gave monosyllabic replies, and, when it was asked, terse advice. He knew the breed, and he gave his advice in the certainty that it would not be followed.

"They told us up above that the bottom was dropping out of the trail and that the best thing for us to do was to lay over," Hal said in response to Thornton's warning to take no more chances on the rotten ice. "They told us we couldn't make White River, and here we are." This last with a sneering ring of triumph in it.

"And they told you true," John Thornton answered. "The bottom's likely to drop out at any moment. Only fools, with the blind luck of fools, could have made it. I tell you straight, I wouldn't risk my carcass on that ice for all the gold in Alaska."

"That's because you're not a fool, I suppose," said Hal. "All the same, we'll go on to Dawson." He uncoiled his whip. "Get up there, Buck! Hi! Get up there! Mush on!"

Thornton went on whittling. It was idle, he knew, to get between a fool and his folly; while two or three fools more or less would not alter the scheme of things.

But the team did not get up at the command. It had long since passed into the stage where blows were required to rouse it. The whip flashed out, here and there, on its merciless errand. John Thornton compressed his lips. Sol-leks was the first to crawl to his feet. Teek followed. Joe came next, yelping with pain. Pike made painful efforts. Twice he fell over, when half up, and on the third attempt managed to rise. Buck made no effort. He lay quietly where he had fallen. The lash bit into him again and again, but he neither whined nor struggled. Several times Thornton started, as though to speak, but changed his mind. A moisture came into his eyes, and, as the whipping continued, he arose and walked irresolutely up and down.

This was the first time Buck had failed, in itself a sufficient reason to drive Hal into a rage. He exchanged the whip for the customary club. Buck refused to move under the rain of heavier blows which now fell upon him. Like his mates, he was barely able to get up, but, unlike them, he had made up his mind not to get up. He had a vague feeling of impending doom. This had been strong upon him when he pulled in to the bank, and it had not departed from him. What of the thin and rotten ice he had felt under his feet all day, it seemed that he sensed disaster close at hand, out there ahead on the ice where his master was trying to drive him. He refused to stir. So greatly had he suffered, and so far gone was he, that the blows did not hurt much. And as they continued to fall upon him, the spark of life within flickered and went down. It was nearly out. He felt strangely numb. As though from a great distance, he was aware that he was being beaten. The last sensations of pain left him. He no longer felt anything, though very faintly he could hear the impact of the club upon his body. But it was no longer his body, it seemed so far away.

And then, suddenly, without warning, uttering a cry that was inarticulate and more like the cry of an animal, John Thornton sprang upon the man who wielded the club. Hal was hurled backward, as though struck by a falling tree. Mercedes screamed. Charles looked on wistfully, wiped his watery eyes, but did not get up because of his stiffness.

John Thornton stood over Buck, struggling to control himself, too convulsed with rage to speak.

"If you strike that dog again, I'll kill you," he at last managed to say in a choking voice.

"It's my dog," Hal replied, wiping the blood from his mouth as he came back. "Get out of my way, or I'll fix you. I'm going to Dawson."

Thornton stood between him and Buck, and evinced no intention of getting out of the way. Hal drew his long hunting-knife. Mercedes screamed, cried, laughed, and manifested the chaotic abandonment of hysteria. Thornton rapped Hal's knuckles with the axe-handle, knocking the knife to the ground. He rapped his knuckles again as he tried to pick it up. Then he stooped, picked it up himself, and with two strokes cut Buck's traces.

Hal had no fight left in him. Besides, his hands were full with his sister, or his arms, rather; while Buck was too near dead to be of further use in hauling the sled. A few minutes later they pulled out from the bank and down the river. Buck heard them go and raised his head to see. Pike was leading, Sol-leks was at the wheel, and between were Joe and Teek. They were limping and staggering. Mercedes was riding the loaded sled. Hal guided at the gee-pole, and Charles stumbled along in the rear.

As Buck watched them, Thornton knelt beside him, and with rough, kindly hands searched for broken bones. By the time his search had disclosed nothing more than many bruises and a state of terrible starvation, the sled was a quarter of a mile away. Dog and man watched it crawling along over the ice. Suddenly, they saw its back end drop down, as into a rut, and the gee-pole, with Hal clinging to it, jerk into the air. Mercedes' scream came to their ears. They saw Charles turn and make one step to run back, and then a whole section of ice gave way and dogs and humans disappear. A yawning hole was all that was to be seen. The bottom had dropped out of the trail.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper, which creates sensation, and brings to its side many new friends.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic. One evening, while looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas.

"TALK a little yourself," exclaimed Andrew, passionately. "It's what you always say when I suggest doing something to better ourselves. You may be willing to slave all your life for a lot of good-for-nothing cattle and hogs, but I don't intend—"

"O get out! You're always talking about slaving, but I notice you always let me lift the heaviest end. You didn't do your share of milking to-night—"

"I did, too!"

Mrs. Miner spoke with great agitation. "It's dreadful for you to quarrel so. You will kill me if you don't stop it." She sat down suddenly and put her thin fingers over her face. The tears trickled through upon her cheeks and the boys were silent. After a moment the older one emptied his milk into a couple of pans, picked up his pail and went out.

Andrew stood irresolutely by the table. "I'm sorry, mother," he went over by her side and spoke as if he was ashamed a little." "Rod nags me all day. He complains if I stop at the end of a furrow to take breath. He's always at me for one thing or another. And I hate the whole business. Mother, I could earn something in town, and you could get a girl to help in the work. Jim Walker went to Colby last winter, and he's in a handsome store there getting thirty-five a month, and he hasn't had any more training for it than I have. He says he thinks he can get me a place in Mansfield's grocery, at twenty-five to start with, and I'd sooner work a year at that than keep on pegging away at this old farm, where we never get ahead any."

Mrs. Miner was drying her tears on her apron.

"But, Andy, you're my baby. What could you do alone in the town? You ain't big enough."

"Why, mother, I'm no baby any longer. I'm eighteen, and I weigh a hundred and forty-five, and I know as much as Jim Walker any day. I can't stand it on the farm any longer. We never have any fun, and we're nothing but clodhoppers any how."

He flung himself down moodily in a kitchen chair, and his mother got up and resumed her dish-washing. Andrew was not looking, or he would have seen a tear fall from his mother's eyes into the dish-water. Her thin hand trembled as she took the dishes out and began wiping them. She was trembling so violently that one of the heavy plates slipped from her grasp, fell with a crash upon the floor, and broke into half a dozen pieces.

Andrew jumped to his feet and exclaimed, "Why, mother, what's the matter? Are you sick? Here! You sit down and let me finish the dishes. You are not well."

The boy insisted on her going into the other room and lying down on a couch there, while he finished the dishes. While he was at work the older boy, Rod, came in with another pail of milk.

"Where's mother?" he asked briefly.

"In the sitting-room."

Rod strained the milk and then went in where his mother was.

Andrew could hear them talking. At first it was in low tones so that he could not catch the words. At last he heard his brother say:

"Oh, well, mother, if Andrew has got his mind fixed on going to town, might as well let him go. He's been of no use on the farm for more than a year. He takes no interest in the work, and I can get along about as well without him around."

Andrew could not hear the mother's reply, but from the tone of Rod's next remark he inferred that she had given a feeble consent.

"He won't need much of an outfit to start on. If he gets the position at Mansfield's it will just about keep him in board, lodging and clothes, but won't leave him any margin for foolishness."

Andrew finished the dishes, scalded out the milk pails, and when he came into the room where his mother was, Rod had gone upstairs.

"Rod thinks you might as well go if you want to, Andy," she said feebly. "But it doesn't seem to me as if I could spare you."

For the first time the boy seemed to have a little remorse.

"I'll stay, mother; I won't go."

"No, you won't be easy till you've gone to live there. I wouldn't care if it wan't for the temptations—"

"But there are plenty of temptations in the country, mother, just as much as in the city," the boy spoke irritably, and his mother shrunk back a little. "I ought to be able to stand up like a man."

"But you're not a man, yet, Andy," his mother said, with a faint smile.

"I will be pretty soon," he muttered, as he walked resolutely up and down.

They talked together for an hour, and at the end of that time Mrs. Miner seemed reconciled to the plan of Andrew's leaving the farm for Colby. Andrew noted her weariness, and suddenly exclaimed,

"You are all tired out, mother! You must go to bed. Call me if you are ill in the night, won't you?"

"Yes, Andy. Good night."

"Good night, mother; good night."

Andrew went up and put his arm on her shoulder and kissed her. It was evidently an unusual act, for she caught his arm and drew him nearer.

He seemed ashamed, and drew back.

"Good night, mother," he said again.

"Good night, Andy," she replied, and went at once to her room.

Andy's room was down stairs next to his mother's. He went into it and at once went to bed and to sleep.

When he awoke he thought at first that it was morning, but after a moment he heard the old clock striking eleven. It was a most unusual hour for him to be awake and he felt nervous and irritable. Then as he lay there after the clock had ceased striking, he heard a voice in the next room. The partition was very thin, and he could not help hearing the voice and the words.

"O Lord," the voice arose in a tone that made Andrew wonder, because it did not sound like his mother's voice at all. "O Lord, be merciful to me. The boy—I don't want him to leave me! It's lonesome out here on this prairie, which you have made to lie under the stars so silent and lost. Three of my pretty ones gone," (Andrew's mind, as he lay listening, traveled out to the little cottonwood grove west of the house, where he had helped his father and Rod dig three little graves for two brothers and a sister, all victims in one day of diphtheria, before a doctor could reach them from Colby), "and then Jason, and now my baby. I cannot bear it! O give me a vision of comfort. I need it so. Have I been wicked beyond measure, O Lord, that I am punished more than others. Janet and Elizabeth were such pretty children. How sweet they looked in their coffins! They smiled at us. But why, O Lord, did you pick them out of our garden, when there are so many other gardens to pick from? Did you need them more than I did, you who have all the world for your own? Could you not spare me my treasures? O, I am desolate! And now my boy. He does not love me, O God! When I drew him towards me to-night, he shrank away! And I nursed him through peril, and in midnight weariness I pillowed his baby head on my bosom for fear you would take him from me. O Lord, are not my burdens heavy to bear? Will you not send an angel to guard my boy from evil? Surely you can spare an angel out of all the hosts of them that do what you tell them to do. O, God, spare my boy! O, God, don't let him perish! O, God, make him love me! O, God, don't let him die as his father died! O, God, —"

Andrew could not endure any more. Every word stabbed him. He felt vaguely that his mother's reason was being shaken. A terror for the future took hold of him, as he sprang out of bed and went out into the sitting-room and knocked trembling on his mother's door.

The voice ceased at once, but Andrew heard sobs.

"Mother, mother, are you ill? Can I do anything for you?"

There was silence a moment, then Mrs. Miner answered in her natural tone, "No, Andy. Was I talking in my sleep? I am sorry if I waked you."

"Can I do anything, mother?"

"No, dear boy. I will go to sleep. I am not in need of anything."

Andrew hesitated. His soul was still agitated by what he had heard. In the darkness he felt his heart beating heavily.

"You don't doubt my love for you, do you, mother?" his voice trembled.

"No, Andy, I never doubted it," the reply came quietly. "Come and kiss me and I will go to sleep and not disturb you any more." Andrew went in and kneeled down by the bed and kissed his mother tenderly. Then as he stroked her thin cheek with his fingers, he said:

"Don't worry about me, mother. I'll go to Colby and become a rich merchant, and take you away from this lonesome place and make you a beautiful home, and you won't have to slave any more."

"I believe you will, Andy. I believe you will. Your old mother is not good for much. But you will not forget her, will you, Andy?"

"Why, of course not, mother," Andy said as he rose and went back into his own quiet little room. "Good night," he added, "and pleasant dreams, mother."

"Good night, Andy."

Next morning Mrs. Miner did not show any signs of unusual mental disturbance, to Andrew's great relief. He did not say a word about the night's experience and did not tell her what he had heard.

In two weeks the boy had secured the clerkship in the grocery store at Colby, and one morning Rod drove him over. There were tears in Andrew's eyes as he kissed his mother good-by.

"Don't cry, mother. I'll send for you before long. Rod can get married and run the farm if he wants to, and you and I will live in town."

Mrs. Miner waited until Rod had gone out with a bundle to put in the wagon. Then she put her arm about Andrew's neck and kissed him passionately.

"I'll pray for you, Andy, day and night."

"Don't, mother." Andrew said stammeringly. "Don't!"

"What! Not pray! But I must. I shall."

"Well, well, mother; I mean, don't worry. I'll be good to you. I won't forget."

His mother stood watching the wagon until it disappeared over a knoll and then went back into the house. After doing the morning work, she went out to the little cottonwood grove where the three small graves and one large one were, and when Rod came back late in the afternoon he could not find his mother anywhere. When he called her, she answered him. He went out to the grove, and found her sitting there talking to herself. Without saying anything, he took her by the hand and led her unresisting back into the house.

The first month of Andrew's stay in Colby, he wrote twice a week regularly to his mother. Then the letters dropped off to once a week. In three months he was writing only occasionally. Rod had driven into town two or three times and brought back word that Andrew seemed to be doing well. He was steady, and his employers were satisfied with him.

Mrs. Miner had been grieving over the failure of letters.

"Don't worry, mother. Andy is all right. He has to work long hours. Grocers' clerks have longer hours than any others. He never was much of a hand to write, anyway."

That was three months after Andrew had gone to Colby. Another month had gone by, and during that time no word came out to the farm about the boy. Rod was very busy and could not spare time to go into town.

One evening after the chores were done, and Mrs. Miner and Rod were in the sitting-room, a knock at the door startled them. When Rod opened the door, he was greeted by the nearest neighbor, who lived four miles away.

"I drove over this evening, Mrs. Miner, with some news, I—thought you ought to hear," the man said slowly.

"Come in," said Rod, briefly. Mrs. Miner rose, trembling, her hands shaking, so that she dropped the ball of yarn she had been holding.

"Is it about Andy?" she asked.

"Yes," said the man. "I thought you ought to know—I—" He stopped awkwardly, and his rough fingers grasped the side of his chair with a nervous grip, as he faced the mother and son in that lonely prairie house where the dim light on the table showed their anxious faces, the mother's bent forward with a trembling appeal that seemed like the countenance of heavy sorrows anticipatory of a blow she must receive, but from which her frail spirit could not recover.

Esther stopped. The audience was not expecting the end. There was a sigh of disappointment among her listeners. Nobody applauded. She slowly walked back to her seat. Mr. Sage rose and said, "Mr. Douglas will finish the story at three o'clock. We begin the afternoon programme promptly at two. Everybody be on hand. Two hours for lunch."

The audience slowly scattered through the grove for their separate lunching places, talking about the story.

"It's pretty harrowing, I think," said Mr. Edwards, while the Colby party were eating the good things Mrs. Edwards and Esther had prepared. "It's the solemnest time I ever knew at a picnic."

The Smallest Episcopal Church in the World

TINY Trinity of Swarthmore, Pa., will be the Mecca for distinguished pilgrims on Sunday, October 18, when the dignitaries of the diocese and prelates from other points will attend the consecration of this interesting little structure. In the eyes of the true Christian, tall towers do not add to the importance of a religious community. A little room filled with earnest worshipers is to the right-thinking mind as impressive as a crowded temple. The little church at Swarthmore is of shingles and vine-covered. It is in the shape of a Latin cross, and presents a most picturesque appearance, peeping out from under the trees that almost hide it from the roadway. At the rear of the church is the parsonage of the pastor, the Rev. Walter A. Matos, a graduate of Pennsylvania University. The parsonage is twice as big as tiny Trinity. The pastor has only to step out of his back door, cross a little stretch of well-kept lawn, over a low hedge and he is at the rear door of the church.

THE NEW TINY TRINITY CHURCH, SWARTHMORE, PA.

The building stands on a corner lot 125 feet by 161 feet. The church is fifteen feet wide at the nave, forty feet long from door to altar, and the transept is seven and a half feet deep. The pews are made to seat three persons. On the occasion of festivities, however, seats are laid down the aisle, and as many as 120 persons can be crowded into the diminutive chapel. Part of the small congregation is made up of stray visitors from the Quaker college near-by, but the members are residents of the vicinity. Their little church has been cleared of debt, and will be handed over to the diocese without encumbrance of any kind.

For so small a church, Trinity has a remarkable library, there being no fewer than 906 volumes. The history of the church dates back to 1894, when the first congregation got together for the purpose of holding cottage meetings. The ground on which the present building stands was purchased in 1895, and the church started by the small congregation as a memorial of gratitude to God for the good example of the Right Reverend Philip Brooks, sixth bishop of Massachusetts.

The pastor, Rev. Walter A. Matos, took charge soon after graduating from college. He is the son of a Spanish father and an English mother. H. D. JONES.

A Syrian Threshing-Floor

UNDER the sky, in a field hard by,
A threshing-floor is found;
And O, what fun, when the work's begun,
And the cows walk slowly round.

By a wall without, encircling about,
The hard, flat earth is bound,
The wheat in the head they steadily tread,
As the cows walk slowly round.

A boy in blue beside the two Steps with an air profound;
With an iron pick he gives them a prick,
And the cows walk slowly round.

To the centre is tossed the stalk which has lost
The wheat that falls to the ground;
And the small boys skip with many a slip,
While the cows walk slowly round.

With nimble feet on the golden wheat,
They clear the floor at a bound;
With flying leap they land in a heap,
And the cows walk slowly round.

On the *mowraj top they deftly hop,
Their feet making never a sound,
As its stony face swings by in its place,
While the cows walk slowly round.

They're here, now there, now everywhere,
Each other's back they pound;
They work and play till close of day,
And the cows walk slowly round.

Mount Lebanon, Syria. E. C. H.

*The mowraj is the Syrian threshing implement, made of wood, flat, about three by four feet, and studded, on its underside, with small, sharp stones. It is drawn slowly over the wheat on the circular threshing-floor by cows, that seem even more meek in Syria than in America.

Famine at Cape Verde Islands

In a letter from Miss Maria Agnes O'Keefe, of Lisbon, Portugal, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the writer sets forth the pitiful condition of the people of the Cape Verde Islands. Twenty thousand men, women and children are declared to be starving. Half the land is uncultivated, and many dead are unburied. In Praia, a soup kitchen is helping a few hundreds, but thousands are totally unaided. Appeal is made to the charity of Americans who may desire to assist the people of the Islands of South Thiaga, where the situation seems to be more urgent than elsewhere.

Women of Title in the Slums

TWO venerable looking and distinguished ladies of title—the Countess von Waldersee and her sister, the Baroness de Waechter-Lauterbach—spent an evening lately, visiting the slums of New York city, with the purpose, it is said, of making a liberal endowment to some mission or charitable work. These ladies, who are both Americans by birth, came here recently from their home in Germany, in consequence of the death of a brother in New York. On the evening in question they visited, among other places, the famous Jerry McAuley Mission, in Water street, and noted with interest the Gospel work among the ex-convicts there. Both ladies were deeply affected by the evidences of sincerity on the part of the reformed men. One reformed convict prayed, "that the millionaires might be sent there, and that they might learn where to place their money, so that it would benefit struggling souls." Every seat in the mission was filled, and the men and women were singing the Gospel hymns with spirit. The visitors remained throughout the service. They listened with genuine interest to the converts' "testimonies," as the latter thanked the Lord for saving them and keeping them from falling back into the old paths of sin. It was all so novel, and so refreshingly unconventional, and the gratitude of the speakers was so apparent in every word they uttered, and in their smiling and happy faces, that the ladies, unaccustomed to such scenes, sat still and marvelled at the wondrous power of God's saving grace in redeeming the outcasts.

The Chinatown Rescue Mission in Dover street was also visited. Here again the Countess and her sister were amazed at the scenes presented. Service was in progress, and the discordant voices of the Chinese, the strange faces, and the many unique features of the mission, all united to make an unusual impression upon the minds of the strangers.

Salvation Army headquarters in Fourteenth street were also visited. A "Harvest Home Festival" was in progress, and everything was proceeding with characteristic enthusiasm, but with order and precision. The ladies chatted in a friendly way with some of the trim "Salvation Lassies," who were wholly unaware of the rank of their two guests. Their general impression of the Army was apparently a pleasant one, and they left after a short stay.

It is understood that the sisters, after their return to Germany, will take steps looking to an endowment in the interest of some benevolent or religious work in New York, but whether any of the places visited will be selected as the beneficiary, cannot now be known.

Converted at Sea

FROM the Rev. J. H. Moore, an American pastor, now traveling in the Orient, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received the following letter, showing the wonderful power of saving grace amid the stormy scenes of an ocean voyage:

BEYROUT, SYRIA July 30.

We left Alexandria, July 24, for Beyrout, on the English steamship Dundee. We had an exciting time. The sea was very rough, and the ship pitched and rocked so alarmingly that the passengers were terrified. During the excitement a little boy, John W—, fell overboard. His mother screamed and fell on the deck, and his father jumped into the sea after him. They were rescued with great difficulty. Mr. W—'s daughter had fled to her stateroom where she was lying prostrate on the bed, crying, "Lost! lost!"

I preached every day. Mary W—, the seventeen-year old daughter of Mr. W—, was converted. I never saw a girl's face shine so brightly. Her father and mother said they did not know what was the matter with her; but she said she was very happy and "she would not be afraid to die now."

Seven of the passengers and five of the crew have professed faith in Christ since we landed here. The engineer, a Greek infidel, has accepted Christ. He said he had never seen such faith demonstrated before.

BEAUTIFUL SUNSHINE

BEAUTIFUL sunshine,
Flooding the day
With all thy splendor,
Come thou to stay.
Stay with thy beauty,
Stay with thy cheer,
Whispering softly,
"Thy God is near."

Beautiful sunshine,
See, God above,
Forward he sends us
With words of love.
Into the darkness,
Into the gloom,
Sunshine, thy brightness,
Shadows, thy doom.

Beautiful sunshine,
May my life be,
Perfect example
Pattern of thee.
Darkness about me,
With deeds of love,
May my life brighten,
Pointing above.

WILLIAM M. UPCRAFT, an American missionary, is preparing for a journey into Tibet—a part of the world as yet almost unknown to civilization. Mr. Upcraft is one of the veterans who have labored in Eastern Asia, and for many years he has been engaged in spreading the Gospel in China. Accompanied by his wife, he has journeyed over a large portion of Western China, penetrating to the border of Tibet itself. About a year ago Mr. and Mrs. Upcraft returned to America to plan the proposed journey, upon which they will set out in September. At Shanghai they will embark in a house-boat, which will carry them up the Yang-tse-Kiang for 2,000 miles, and thence by land and water to their destination.

Few missionaries have experienced more dangers in their chosen fields than Mr. Upcraft. His success is partly due to his mastery of the Chinese, German, French and Tibetan tongues, enabling him to converse with many in the west country who are unfamiliar with the ordinary dialect of the Eastern Chinese. Mr. and Mrs. Upcraft come from Alton, Ills.

Hearty Commendation

We received yesterday the ten pictures comprising the "Family Art Gallery," and we readily pronounce them all, individually and collectively, good. They speak louder than words of the liberality and enterprise of the publishers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and accounts for the success the paper has attained. Wishing your publication could find its way into every household, and crowd out some of the trashy literature of the present day, I remain W. B. WESTERVELT.

MY TRYST

"O, that I knew where I might find him."

AITHFULLY keep my tryst with God,
And softly steal up the stair,
I ponder a page of the blessed Word,
And cast at his feet my care.

ek the place where the faithful few
Are gathered for praise and prayer, voice from heaven, no cloven tongue,
Yet the Lord himself is there.

t apart His holy day,
Barring out the great world's din;
the Lord fulfils his promises,
The opened door entering in.

my heart cries out for thee, O God,
And I long for the living bread;
the seed thou didst sow in my stony heart,
Is a growing thing, not dead.

see my God in moon and star,
He shines on me through the day;
ar His voice in the passing wind,
And the waves that plash in the bay.

e my God in my daily lot
As I follow the path He trod, live and love reveals His face,
For life and love are God. —M. W. B.

IE LAW of THE HARVEST" rifice the Only Way to Achievement in Nature and in Human Life

VEN now, after nineteen hundred years, we have still to speak of "the mystery of the Cross." Who is there of all the thinkers, philohers and divines who have studied that stery, that has solved it? Why was it essary to God or man that Jesus uld die? If he was simply a martyr, e is no difficulty. Good men in every have laid down their lives for their nciples and their faith. But our Chrisity could not have grown out of the tyrdom of Jesus. There is a deeper aning than that in his death. Through t awful tragedy man finds his way to d. Christ voluntarily laid down his with the definite purpose of opening t path. But how could his death effect t purpose? There is the mystery. We not know; but we do know by our own erience and by the experience of milus, who have lived since Christ died, t it does effect the purpose. Christ self realized the fact. Even in the er agony of Gethsemane, he saw that cup could not pass from him unless drank it; and he would not abandon purpose even to save his life. How he sustained in that fearful ordeal? s own words furnish the clue to the stery: "Except a corn of wheat fall into ground and die, it abideth alone; but t die, it bringeth forth much fruit."

Are there any clues in life to this law the harvest, which is the law of sacri-? The material harvest furnishes a ar clue. A man has a bag of wheat. y he is alone on an island, and it is y precious to him. Shall he eat it? all he save it for an emergency? If he s either, he is lost. The only safe rse is to sow it, to give it up to the th, which will give it back to him fifty a hundredfold. It is by sacrificing wheat, giving up that which is his y life, that he gets his harvest. Hisy also gives us a clue. Two martyrs, timer and Ridley, were burned at the ke. "Be of good comfort Master lley," said Latimer, "we shall this day ht such a candle, by God's grace, in gland, as I trust shall never be put ." We had a clue in our own history the hanging of John Brown. We have es in the deaths of missionaries which ve led to, or vastly accelerated great vements. Suppose a man has striven his life for a cause that is very dear to n. He comes at last to the supreme sis when his life is in danger. Will he n back then? Will the natural love of e force him to abandon his cause? If does love his life so much, eventually will lose it and lose his cause too; but he sacrifices life, he ennobles his cause, ngs it to triumph, and counts his life ll sacrificed if only the truth win. That the law of the harvest.

LIQUIDATION SALE

HIGH-CLASS BOOKS

So-called "bargains" are offered daily by merchants in the various lines of business, but it is only once in a while that a real bargain opportunity is offered, and usually it results from the forced sale for the express purpose of closing up the affairs of some business house.

The stock we offer includes writings of the standard authors of the world. There is nothing in literature which has taken, or ever will take the place of these books. They will be read with interest as long as the English language is spoken, and since these books are offered to you at great reductions from the regular price, we believe there will be some among this exceptional list which you certainly will desire to possess—particularly when we inform you that this is a genuine going out of business sale, and the goods must be sold, and sold quickly.

It is the sole purpose of this sale to dispose of all the magnificent stock of special library editions of the great writers of the world that the important publishing house, Coryell & Company, have on hand. It is not expected to be a money-making sale. Stock must be turned into money as quickly as possible and the prices offered should attain this end in a very short time. Those beautiful sets of books must be sacrificed in order to liquidate the business of Coryell & Company, who are renowned for their fine editions of standard authors. It is really the best book buying opportunity ever offered.

The books themselves are ideal in every respect—extra fine paper especially manufactured for these high class editions, beautiful clear type, exquisite illustrations, title page in colors, and bound in the best of imported English cloth, with head bands, gilt tops, full gilt backs, stamped with panel design and fleur-de-lis ornaments.

Every lover of books should read this announcement with care, for the prices offered in connection with the easy monthly payment plan afford an exceptional opportunity to add to your library that which is not only of interest to you, but must be to your family and friends.

You will notice that only a few sets of the writings of some of the authors are to be had, and as these goods are being sold for liquidation purposes only the figures announced are absolute; and the books given are all that we have on hand and that we shall have to dispose of.

We do not wish you to send any money when ordering sets of books of us. Please use coupon when ordering, designating the works of such authors as you desire, and we will send the books to you, prepaying all delivery charges. You can retain them five days so as to have plenty of time for inspection. If you decide to keep them, you are to pay us in accordance with the prices and terms offered in this advertisement. If you should not care after seeing the books to retain them, you may return them to us, delivery expenses collect.

This is an opportunity you should embrace, for it is not often that fine books are sold at prices we offer, and since you do not obligate yourself to purchase the books until you have seen them, you are taking no chance whatsoever.

Those sending request for inspection for books to be sent to them after our stock has been exhausted, we will notify promptly. Do not send any money until the goods have been delivered to you by us, received by you, and found satisfactory.

The Hero of the Exodus*

What the Life of Moses Has to Teach to Modern Christians

AMONG the great names of history that of Moses stands in the first rank. As leader and organizer and law-giver he surpasses all men of antiquity. How can his life, so eventful, so extraordinary, have lessons suitable for the prosaic lives of modern times? Yet there were in Moses traits of character which can be developed in the humblest Christian to-day raising his character, too, to sublimity and practical usefulness. It is not by working miracles, nor by reproving kings that Moses won his way to everlasting fame. It is not by these that he is best remembered, but by qualities that are the common inheritance of the race—qualities which in him, through communion with the Infinite, became predominant in his nature, and so cleared it of the earthly elements that his very face shone with the glory that it caught from the heavenly Majesty.

The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews dwells upon his faith, and truly that was the indispensable beginning of such a career. He could never have ventured on such a mission as that to Pharaoh if he had not fully believed in God and trusted him. It was a deed of daring possible only to one who saw Him who is invisible. The same God is our God still, yet how few of us dare rely on him as Moses did!

His loyalty, too, was a conspicuous trait of character. It must have been a strong temptation to a young man, reared and educated in Pharaoh's palace, to ignore his origin and cast in his lot with the dominant race. On the one side ease and power, and riches and high station; on the other disgrace, misery and peril of life. Yet "he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God." To those who even in our Christian land hesitate to join a church and confess Christ before the world, what an example Moses is!

His meekness is the characteristic the Bible chiefly dwells on. In that also he may be copied by us moderns. That a man so great, so honored of God, as to be admitted into the Divine presence, so splendid in his achievements, should have submitted to the criticisms and murmurings and rebellions of his people as did Moses, is a mark of true greatness. When we are moved with indignation at opposition or censure, how sorely we need to remember the example of Moses!

His unhesitating obedience is another characteristic in which he may be imitated. The Divine command was his law, and even when, as at the Red Sea. it seemed contrary to reason and prudence, Moses never wavered. In the crises of our lives when our duty is clear, may we, like Moses, do it courageously and refuse to temporize!

Lend-a-Hand Book Mission

The Lend-a-Hand Book Mission, No. 1 Beacon street, Boston, is constantly receiving applications for second-hand books, magazines and papers from people of both the black and white races in the rural districts of the South. The demand far exceeds the supply. Some of the Southern women's clubs have entered upon a very extensive traveling library work, the value of which cannot be overestimated. Each library consists of from fifty to one hundred useful and entertaining books, which is sent to a village community, where the people have little to read, and, after remaining from three to six months, is transported to other equally barren regions. The women's clubs of the North are invited to co-operate with the Lend-a-Hand Club in giving aid to the Southern women's clubs in their efforts to uplift a large class of people, with good mental ability, who lack opportunities. Any reader who is interested in this movement should write a list of reading matter collected, and send the list to Miss Sarah P. Brigham, of the Lend-a-Hand Club office, who will inform the writer to whom and to what place in the South to send the contribution. None are to be forwarded to Boston.

"The Best Paper in the World"

Fifteen families are now taking your paper through my efforts. I am happy to know that this little has been accomplished, for I consider it mission work. No better mission paper was ever printed. I fully believe it to be the finest paper in the world. The tone is kept up so beautifully from year to year. I may never again write to you. Have very nearly reached my seventy-fifth year. Am looking over to the other shore. Hope the HERALD may reach hundreds of thousands more than it does now. It has my earnest, best wishes.

A little while ago a man, through knowledge of the law, was able to earn a fee of $500,000 for a few days work—ordinarily he makes as much in a day a most men would be pleased to have for a year' work. It is a power that makes me prominent—at the bar, or in business, o in any other profession. If you are am bitious to get into the upper walks of life but cannot go to college, you can

avid's Lament Over His Grievous Sin

By Mrs. M. Baxter

A MAN does not fall into grave sin suddenly. There is always some previous unfaithfulness which leads up to it. "Lead us not into mptation," we pray. It is not so much ir circumstances, the places or the per- ons with which, or with whom, we are onnected, as our attitude towards God, hich tells for or against the power of mptation. David was God's witness at the Lord was his Shepherd. He had id of him, "He leadeth me"; and every lf-made plan on his part was a false itness against this relationship which od, in his grace and love, bore towards m. Satan, seeing that God's child was ting independently of him, found the or of his heart left on the latch, and he ntered in with his terrible temptation.

One sin leads to another. David not nly deeply sinned, but also devised every eans of deceit and treachery to cover s sin, so that the shame and reproach it should not come upon him. But God as against these efforts of his erring ild; the covering of his sin did not rosper, and the noble conduct of the nsuspecting Uriah should have aroused e drugged conscience of David, and ade him confess with grief and shame s sin against the Lord, and the deep rong which he had done to Uriah. But man of God who sins falls lower than ny other: he has not the "godliness of e flesh" (Isa. 40:6) to fall back upon, nd when he falls, great indeed is his ll. Uriah was killed in battle by the ommand of David, who gave orders at he should be put in a position of anger; but David's sin could not long e hidden.

David took Bathsheba to be his wife, nd a child was born. But God was sorely spleased. But our God is a true Father, nd his displeasure does not alter his love, e took means to restore his erring child, nd sent the prophet Nathan to him. h the tender love of our God! If he ere to wait until a fallen child comes ack to him, who could endure unto the nd? Nathan came with his story of the oor man and his ewe lamb, snatched om him by the rich man. David's in- gnation was aroused, and he said, "As e Lord liveth, he that hath done this ing shall surely die." "Thou art the an" was the stern rejoinder, and the ales fell from his eyes as the prophet et before him the favor which had been own him from the Lord, and asked him, Wherefore hast thou despised the com- andment of the Lord, to do evil in his ght?"

At last the drugged and sleeping con- cience of God's fallen servant was arous- d. For months there had been no inter- ourse between him and God; but now e could no more cover his sin, and he egan to confess and to forsake it. "I ave sinned against the Lord." Yes, he ad broken both the sixth and seventh ommandments, and by the law he ought o die. Only God can remit his own law, nd he said through the prophet, "The ord also hath put away thy sin; thou halt not die."

It was just at this time that David rote the fifty-first Psalm. He no longer ulks of his righteousness as in Psalm 7: 3; 18:20-24. His only plea was, "The oving kindness and tender mercies," and is petition was not only for pardon, but Blot out my transgressions; wash me horoughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse e from my sin." It is the first time the lotting out of sin is mentioned in the cripture, although cleansing is much ealt with in the Book of Leviticus. nce his eyes opened, once again in fel- owship with God, an intense loathing of is sins took possession of him. "For I cknowledge my transgression, and my n is ever before me," he says. He nderstands now, and enters into God's houghts about sin, and sees the injury e has done to God—even the great evil hich his example would be to his eople; for in all his sin against man, he nned more deeply against God. Against hee, thee only, have I sinned, and done is evil in thy sight: that thou mightest e justified when thou speakest, and be ear when thou judgest." And he saw n the light of the holiness of God the tate of his own heart.

Our New Catalogue is Now Ready

Catalogue No. 72, fresh from the printing presses and containing more goods that are really up-to-date and of the very latest style and design than any other six catalogues published, is now ready for distribution.

It will save you money on everything you buy and enables you to make your selections as readily and satisfactorily as if you could come to Chicago every day. It puts you in direct touch with the great markets of the world and places before you a stock of first-class goods more complete in every detail than has ever before been offered by any firm and at prices that are positively the lowest, when the reliable quality of the merchandise is taken into consideration. This catalogue contains over 1,100 pages of quotations on reliable merchandise of every description. No matter what you may need, you will find the article fully described and illustrated in our great book at a price that no shrewd buyer should overlook.

More than 2,000,000 people sent us orders last year—many of them were your neighbors. They gave us their business simply because we sold them reliable goods for less money than they could buy the same goods for elsewhere and at the end of the year found that they had made an average saving of 25 per cent on their purchases. If your neighbors find it to their advantage to trade with us, why can't you? If you have never traded with us, now is the time to begin. Ordering from a great catalogue is convenient and satisfactory; in the leisure of your own home you can make selection from a mammoth stock of thoroughly reliable merchandise, all quoted at the lowest possible prices.

You can, if you desire, compare prices with those you have been accustomed to pay and you can thus get better results than by making a hasty examination at a local store. You not only have the advantage of your own deliberate judgment but you are protected by the strongest guarantee ever made by any mercantile house, for we extend to all purchasers the privilege of returning goods at our expense if they are not satisfied with their purchases; and, even more, we agree to replace any shipment damaged or lost in transit; in other words, we assume all the responsibility.

In 1872 we originated the catalogue plan of buying and during the thirty-two years of our life have grown steadily each year until our business is now one of the largest in the world. We reached this position by treating people fairly, giving honest value and avoiding all forms of trickery, exaggeration, or misrepresentation. With Catalogue No. 72 in your possession you can buy from us almost as easily as if you visited our store in person, and we cordially invite every person desiring reliable goods at wholesale prices to fill out coupon at the right and send for a copy. The book is new from cover to cover; contains all the new goods of the season; is complete in every department; so there is no better time than the present to send for a copy and begin trading with us if you are satisfied with our prices and goods. The experiment will cost you only 15 cents. It may result in a saving of hundreds of dollars the first year.

Catalogue No. 72 Contains

17,000 pictures of the things that we describe, 70,000 prices on them. The prices are the lowest wholesale prices on the market.

PLEASANT TENT HOMES OF THE INVALIDS AT THE Y. M. C. A. HEALTH FARM, DENVER, COL.

Fighting a Silent Battle in Tents

THE CONSUMPTIVE HEALTH FARM OF THE COLORADO Y. M. C. A. NOW AN ACCOMPLISHED FACT

TWO years ago, the Young Men's Christian Association of Denver, Colo., began a work which is probably the only one of its kind ever undertaken by any similar organization on this continent. To the State of Colorado there comes yearly, a constant stream of consumptive patients, hoping in that dry and invigorating climate to win back health and strength. Among those who came to Colorado for this purpose, were many deserving young men, some of them quite poor, and unable to bear the expense of a sojourn of sufficient length to be of any permanent physical benefit.

After much thought and preparation, the Denver Young Men's Christian Association, co-operating with the State Executive Committee, decided to take up the burden of the sick ones, and to establish a Health Farm in a suitable section. Early in 1901, State Secretary W. M. Danner, visited the East in the interest of the project, and many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will doubtless recall the very clear and interesting outline of the Health Farm plan, which appeared in these columns, from Mr. Danner's pen, at that time.

The Y. M. C. A. Health Farm is now a thing accomplished. Just how it looks at the present time may be gathered from the interesting photographs on this page. It is one of the most interesting and deserving charities of the West. This farm is, in part, the gift of Mr. and Mrs. David Brothers, who gave to the Association thirty-four of the ninety-four acres. Dr. Edward P. George, of Hanover, Germany, gave the first $5,000 required for purchasing additional land for the farm. $5,000 more were given by friends of the good cause in the East, and a number of individuals and organizations have given cottage-tents for the patients.

The formal opening of the Association Health Farm took place in May, and was attended by many of the most prominent people in Denver. The farm is within a mile and a half of the Denver street-car line and five miles from the centre of the city, and is on a high ridge in the fruit-growing district. It has irrigation ditches, and there are thirty-four acres in fruit trees and eight acres in small fruits, so that there is plenty of out-door work for the patients. There is a good brick house, used as an office and a home for the superintendent and a dining-room for the patients; but the patients themselves live in the snug little tents, each man having a tent to himself. These tents have wooden floors, and are wainscoated to a distance of three feet from the ground. The rest of the sides and the roofs are of stout canvas. There are screened doors and windows, and it is an imperative rule that the tents shall be kept perfectly clean and neat. There is an iron bedstead, chiffonier, table, washstand, rocking-chair and a neat rug or two in each tent. Then there is a reading-tent, supplied with the best of literature, and the men may play games here. Patients are received on a basis of twenty-five dollars per month, and credit is given each man for all the work he does. When a man can supply his own tent and furnish it, he is given board in the farm dining-room for twenty dollars per month. The climate of Colorado is such that patients can live in the tents all the year.

Physicians of the highest prominence have declared that the Health Farm method of caring for consumptives assuredly arrests the progress of the disease and even restores to health those patients who can have the benefit of the change in time. Some in whom the disease has made a good deal of progress have been wonderfully helped after a stay of a month or two at the farm. It goes without saying, that the demand for admission to the farm far exceeds its capacity, and a sorrowful thing in connection with the work is the fact that patients must be denied admittance every day. The present accommodations would need to be more than doubled to admit even a portion of the applicants who are now turned away. So successful has the experiment been up to the present time, that those in charge feel assured that it only needs to be more widely known to become universally popular in the treatment of pulmonary diseases.

Fatality is the rule on the farm. The "Pittsburg" tent was the gift of the Pittsburg Y. M. C. A., the "Baldwin," the gift of the Baldwin Locomotive Works of Philadelphia, the "Livermore" tent, the gift of a Brookline, Mass., lady, in memory of her father. A consumptive tent can be put up and furnished for $125. Patients who can work at all are required to do so. Some can almost pay their way by their labor, and are all the better for being occupied in the open air. A much larger equipment is needed for the farming and stock work. If coal has grown too costly in these days for any one person's purse to afford to spend lavishly for the sick and suffering, anything done for them will surely have seen it the end of his appraisal, and will be recorded in the book of his remembrance.

THE SPIRITUAL MOUNTAIN-TOPS

By REV. A. B. SIMPSON, D.D.

TEXTS { "He shall dwell on high . . . Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty; they shall behold the land that is very far off."—ISAIAH 33: 16, 17.
"Come with me from Lebanon, look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards."—SOLOMON'S SONG 4: 8.

THE mountains are God's monumental object lessons, pointing our hearts to heaven and elevating our vision to the farthest distances of lofty thought and aspiration. The people that dwell on the mountain heights have usually the sublimest history. Greece and Palestine, Switzerland and Scotland, earth's loftiest highlands, have figured in the most heroic chapters of human history.

The most important incidents of the story of the Bible have been associated with mountain heights. God's great covenant with the race was sealed beneath the rainbow arch on the summits of Ararat with Noah. God's greatest revelation to Abraham was made on the sacrificial heights of Mount Moriah. It was on a mountain that Moses received the revelation of the law and the vision of God. Mount Zion was the city of David's throne and Jehovah's tabernacle. It was on Mount Carmel that Elijah led Israel back from their apostasy and turned a whole nation unto God. It was on a mountain that the Son of God delivered his first great message of righteousness; on a mountain he was transfigured; on a mountain he was crucified, and from the heights of Olivet he ascended to his Father's throne, and it is to that same mountain height that he will yet return again. It was from a mountain in Galilee that he gave the great commission to the disciples, and it was from a great high mountain that John beheld the new Jerusalem descending out of heaven from God.

May our spiritual mountain-tops prove in the coming years like Ararat of old the covenant mountain where the rainbow arch of God's peace shall ever cover us; like Moriah, the place of revelation where the cross shall be revealed in all its glory as it was to Abraham, and it shall be true to tens of thousands "in the mount it shall be seen;" like Horeb, we shall ascend as Moses and the elders of Israel with the sprinkled blood, and it shall be true of us as it was of them "they saw the God of Israel; and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of sapphire stone and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness. And upon the nobles of the children of Israel he laid not his hand. Also they saw God and did eat and drink;" as Mount Zion, a dwelling place of Jehovah and the place where he shall come to dwell within his peoples' hearts; as Mount Carmel, the place where the backslider shall return and shouts of ransomed souls proclaim: "The Lord he is the God;" as the mountain of Beatitudes, where he shall teach us the righteousness of the kingdom as he did on Mount Hattin of old; as Hermon's heights, where we, too, shall find our transfiguration; as Calvary where we shall behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world; as Olivet, where we shall rise to dwell with him in the ascension heights and to wait for him in his descending glory; as that mountain in Galilee, where we shall receive the great commission and thousands shall go forth to disciple all nations and prepare the world for the coming of our blessed Lord.

But there are spiritual mountain heights of which these earthly altitudes are but

Types and Stepping-Stones

It is of these we are to speak, and it is to these our feet are to climb amid the inspirations of mountain views. What it means to dwell on high. It is a great matter to get clear and definite spiritual conceptions. There is a hazy and sentimental way of talking about religious improvement that leaves no satisfactory or explicit impression upon the heart. The world has its theories and dreams of self-government; but they do not lift men higher or make them better. It is not improvement and elevation we want—it is resurrection. The Scriptural conception of a higher life is not so much a higher life as the highest life. It is not raising up—it is resurrection. It is not trying to do a little better every day, but it is finding out our complete failure and helplessness, and by one decisive act dying forever to all our strength and goodness and rising as from the grave to a life wholly divine through our union with the Lord Jesus Christ, and henceforth living, not a little higher, but in the very heights where he lives, and reckoning ourselves to be dead indeed unto sin but alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord, and even sitting with him in heavenly places and being in this world even as he. As the sainted Dr. Gordon expressed it once, it is not a man on earth trying to get to heaven, but it is a man in heaven walking upon the earth, his head in the heights of supernal light and life while his feet tread the paths of earth and time. This is the apostle's conception of the new life in his great epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians. "If ye then were resurrected with Christ seek those things that are above. For ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God." You belong there. Count it so. Reckon on it. Live up to it and the realization will come to you in your actual experience.

Now there are several steps in this experience. The first is the discovery of your utter helplessness and worthlessness and pronouncing the death sentence upon yourself by a definite and final act of surrender and reckoning.

The second is the act of appropriating faith by which you take Christ as your life and count yourself united to him, risen with him and even as he, and henceforth live as if you were not the same man that used to live here but a new man just born out of heaven, belonging to heaven and now living as if in heaven.

Then there is a third experience which makes all this a habit which settles into a posture and a poise in the divine life, and abides moment by moment out of self and in him. It is finely illustrated by the picture of two birds in the firmament. There is one spreading its wings with constant effort and struggling by labored flight into heights above. But the other is making no effort. With wings spread out upon the bosom of the sky it floats in the ocean of the air poised, resting in mighty and exquisite repose, dwelling on high and looking down upon every object from above. This is the attitude of those who dwell on high. This is the ideal place where faith can live enthroned with Christ and sing of something better than even dwelling on the mountains, for it is dwelling in the heavens.

Beloved, do we know this resurrected life? Will we claim it and take with us the heights of God for our eternal dwelling-place?

The immunities and privileges of this ascension life.

Its security. "His place of defence shall be the mountains of rocks." There are enemies we cannot fight on their own level, but we can rise above them and smile at their baffled rage, even as the little bird can escape the crawling reptile and soar away from the dragon's devouring mouth. There are ten thousand temptations and cares, for which the remedy is to live above them, and as you look at them from the heights of Christ's throne and coming, they will lose their power either to terrify or charm you.

Its abundant supply for all our need. "Bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure." Dwelling on high, the living Christ is the constant supply of all our need. Feeding upon him as our Living Bread, we shall never hunger, and drinking of his life we shall never thirst, and the Holy Spirit, of which the waters are the type, shall flow through all our being and supply all our need. Dwelling in this high and holy place, where the waters are sure, sealed by the Holy Ghost unto the day of redemption, our sun shall no more go down, our souls shall no more backslide, our joys shall no more decline. We are kept by the power of God unto salvation. Our bread is given us. It is not toiled for and hardly earned, but our table is spread in the presence of our enemies, our wants are all supplied, and our life is one of liberty and perfect rest.

It is a place of Divine revelation. "Thine eyes shall see the King in his beauty." It brings to us the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ in all his loveliness and grace. It is one thing to know the truth, it is another thing to see it and to feel it in realizing power. It is s another and higher blessing to behold Christ in liv reality, and know in the intimate communion the Per of Christ himself, as the substance of the truth and centre of our life and joy. The prayer of the apos for his beloved friends at Ephesus and Colossi was t they might have the spirit of revelation in the knowlec of him. This is much more than the knowledge truth. It is a divine conception of Christ himself wh makes him truly, really personally near and dear to heart, as no other person or friend can be. This is wh the human heart needs, and what no power on earth c give, that mystic touch which makes the Lord Jesu living, bright reality forevermore to the soul that lo him.

Truth and teaching are but stepping-stones to th glorious vision. Conventions and assemblies are t the entrance court to the palace of the King, but t King himself is more than all. To know him in glory is our deep desire, our highest hope and that the blessed privilege which we shall forever enjoy if will but rise to this resurrected life and dwell with h on high. We shall always have access to his pr ence, we shall see his face, we shall know him ev here and we shall be satisfied by the vision of his lo We shall see him in his beauty. We shall see h so as to love him to delight in him. We shall see t loveliness of his person, his character and our affectio will be divinely tuned. We shall not have to ask, "I I love the Lord or no. Am I his or am I not?" T vision of his loveliness will set our hearts aglow even the rising of the summer sun brings out all the blosso and leaves in the forest and the field. Oh, do we n long for a vision of the King in his beauty!

Higher Privileges

The larger vision of the land of far distances. Th promise means those views and conceptions of t privileges and possibilities of our own Christian li which comes to us when we dwell on high. It is wh the apostle speaks of in his Alpine climb in the fi chapter of the Ephesians, where he prays that we "m know the exceeding greatness of his power toward who believe according to the working of his migh power which he wrought in Christ when he raised hi from the dead and set him at his own right hand in t heavenlies." He is calling to us in these last days. H is leading his people up to the highest possibilities Christian life and character. He is not only cleansi but robing his Bride for the marriage of the Lam Let us meet the call.

Forward, forward, leave the past behind thee,
Reaching forth unto the things before,
All the land of promise lies before thee,
God has greater blessings yet in store.
On to vaster fields of holy vision,
On to loftier heights of faith and love,
Onward, upward, apprehending wholly,
All for which he calls thee from above.

But there is another vision of the far distances which he calls us, the vision of the world's bright ha vest, and the awful need of dying millions. He wan to lift us out of our littleness. He wants to raise u above our selfishness. He wants to translate us out narrowness, and make the world our parish, a put us in trust with the Gospel for the whole hum race. For thee, my brother, he has something grand than thy highest dream, something larger than t noblest ambition.

There are souls with no one else to care for,
There are things that no one else can do.
Forward, forward, choose the noblest service,
Go where Christ has greatest need of you.
On, till every tongue, and tribe, and kindred,
Hear the glorious Gospel's joyful sound.
Forward, forward, till the name of Jesus
Shall re-echo all the world around.

Let us now turn to our last text, and look at som mountain peaks in these spiritual highlands.

Lebanon, or the mountains of prayer, for the wor Lebanon means incense, and well represents the heigh of prayer. It was while he prayed that the Master w transfigured, and we shall find the place of ascensio always of prostration, and supplication, and communio with God. Let these heights be altars of interce sion, Peniels of pleading at the mercy seat, and Leb nons of holy incense rising to the throne, and filling a the mountain side with the fragrance of the Master presence and the Spirit's grace.

Amana, or the mountain of truth. These are th mounts of Divine revelation through the holy Scri tures, the unfolding of these great thoughts of God, an messages of the Holy Ghost. It is by these that yo shall rise to the highest points of spiritual vision. L your days be days of Bible study and Divine illumin tion through the Holy Ghost and the Holy Scripture.

Planting Mountain Sunday Schools

An American Sunday School Union Evangelist's Tour of the West Virginia Highlands : : :

WEST VIRGINIA, with her rich natural resources, has had a vast industrial growth in the last few years. Lumber, mining, oil, gas, and manufacturing industries are flourishing, and many new and important towns are being established. It is estimated that the population has increased 150,000 in the past two years. While many churches have been built in the larger towns, and much work done along this line, the material growth has been far greater than the religious growth. It can be safely estimated that there are now at least 150,000 children in the State, entirely without religious instruction, and fully twice as many adults, not touched by the influence of the church, especially in the back country districts.

REV. R. M. BUSLER AND WIFE

But the religious destitution of the State is not alone in the lumber camps and new mining towns. There are many places back in the mountains, practically out of reach of all outside influences, where the most primitive conditions exist, and where poverty abounds. Many of these communities are entirely without any religious privileges.

It is a great and important work to reach these places with the Gospel. Rev. Ray M. Busler, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union, is now visiting these out-of-the-way places, and the new mining towns, and organizing Sunday Schools. His motto is, "A Sunday School in every community; a Bible in every home." So far this year, he has established twenty schools, besides aiding those previously started. He has recently returned from a seven weeks' trip back in the mountains, some times sixty-five miles or more from the railroads. He organized seven schools, delivered thirty sermons and addresses, distributed about one hundred Bibles and Testaments, and traveled nearly seven hundred miles, some of the way over roads too rough to be described. Many of the Bibles distributed went into homes where there had never been a Bible before. Much religious literature, picture papers, picture cards, and text buttons were also distributed, where they were sadly needed. The children were specially pleased.

Mrs. Busler was with him on this tour. They carried a telescope organ, and her playing was a decided help in the meetings, and a great attraction to the people. The sweet songs of Zion were heard for the first time in this way, in many a home.

In going into a new neighborhood, Mr. Busler sometimes finds the people a little shy at first; but he soon wins their confidence. Often they have strange notions about a Sunday School. One woman asked: "How much do you charge a scholar?" She thought she would have to pay so much for each scholar, and, as she was a poor widow with a number of children, she would have to count the cost, before pledging any of them to attend.

He asked some children, whom he met, if they were going to attend Sunday School. They said: "We can't, because we have no fitten clothes to wear." They were sadly in need of decent clothes. In one community, he found nearly one hundred children where there had never been a Sunday School, and where many of the people had never had an opportunity to buy or obtain a Bible, or even a Testament before.

Mr. Busler says of this trip: "It was a hard and tiresome journey, but I enjoyed it; the scenes were constantly changing, and there was something new and interesting all the time. There were many things that touched my sympathies, and some things that made me sad. So many of the people seemed 'as sheep having no shepherd.' They needed help, and I appreciate the opportunities I have had to help them."

Sometimes the missionary gets little or no encouragement. The superintendent of a mine said: "Don't waste your time on this place; the people have no more religion than a goat."

Many encouraging reports are received from the schools that have been organized. One superintendent says, "The school has been doing well; the children have been quite regular in attendance." And another, "We are having a good time at our school, and very good attendance." (This school was organized out in the woods, and held one or two meetings there before the schoolhouse was opened for it). "We are progressing very nicely with our school; the attendance has been very good," another writes. "We continue to prosper." All that is needed in many communities is to give the people a good start and assist them or help whenever needed, and they will go on with the school, and do good work. But they will not begin for themselves.

In one community where a school was organized about a year ago, a revival meeting had to be held before a superintendent could be secured or general interest aroused. Now there is an organized church, with preaching every other week, a flourishing Sunday School, and an interesting prayer meeting.

YOUNG MOUNTAINEERS

One man said, "Go on and get your Sunday School started, and if you run it all right, I will pitch in and help you." He at first thought the missionary was going to move into the neighborhood and conduct the school the rest of the year, and he was somewhat in doubt about pledging his cooperation to an untried stranger.

A man who had bought a Bible said to the missionary afterward, "This is the first real Bible we have ever had." This man is well-to-do, and has a family of eight children. A woman who is the grandmother of thirty-seven children in the school district, never had a Bible in the house. Another woman wanted to know the difference between the New Testament and the Holy Bible.

The missionary of the American Sunday School Union is not only a Sunday School organizer, but a pastor, evangelist, Bible colporteur, tract distributor, and friend generally of the poor and neglected. He helps the people eventually to become self-supporting in their own neighborhoods. Any reader desiring to aid in this important Sunday School work, can address E. P. Bancroft, Secretary, American Sunday School Union, 158 Fifth avenue, New York City, who will answer all inquiries.

SAVING THE CHILDREN OF THE STREET

SEVERAL years ago several New York ladies, who had taken a deep interest in the welfare of working girls and in the training of the children of the poor, established a Children's Club in one of the most populous sections of the West Side. It was an outcome of the Irene Club, an organization for working girls previously established by Miss Grace Dodge, and which has been productive of much good to a very large number of young women.

Among the ladies who were prominently interested in the movement for the Children's Club were Mrs. Allen Tucker and Miss Augusta Bliss, who contributed liberally towards its support. It is located at No. 361 West Thirty-fourth street, New York, and is now one of the most flourishing institutions of its kind in the city. Its object is moral, social and educational, and it aims to keep the younger children from roaming the streets after school hours and during the hot summer months—in brief, to generally improve the conditions of child-life among the poor of the great metropolis.

About five hundred children are enrolled on the club's books. They are divided into various classes, including classes in basket-making, kitchen gardening, sewing, raffia work, basket weaving, knitting, etc. All the teachers are college graduates, who have had special training in their own particular lines.

In the summer months, during school vacations, the children are taken on excursions, at the Club's expense, to the Bronx, Van Cortlandt Park and other points along the Hudson River and seashore. These excursions are greatly enjoyed by the little ones, and the lessons learned will not soon be forgotten by the children. These excursions are usually limited from forty to sixty children, and are thought to be very helpful. During the summer, the kindergarten class is given up to out-door work, and the children spend a part of each day in the open air. Every Saturday morning, during the summer months, the children are taken to the Central Park Menagerie, and a delightful time is spent by them. Each child is given a ticket, and tickets will not be given to any child who has been absent from the club during the week. Each child is also required to bring a penny every Saturday morning, which is put into the bank for the child. Many children have in this way saved enough money to buy their own clothes.

The Children's Club is known as a community club, and has become a blessing and help to many families in the neighborhood. Mothers' meetings are held, at which practical lessons in cooking, sewing, etc., are taught, and the mothers are encouraged to attend the kindergarten class with their children. Many of the mothers have been induced to become members of the club, and to take an active part in its work.

France Ready to Invade Morocco

An Army of 26,000 Troo to Restore Order in the Sultan's Unquiet Dominio

FOR many months past, cruel war has been raging in Morocco. Not only has the situation become intolerable to foreigners in that country, but all intercourse, commercial and otherwise, has, for the time being, been suspended, while the Sultan's troops and the rebels have been endeavoring to settle their quarrels in a series of skirmishes, hardly one of which reached the dignity of a regular engagement. Matters went from bad to worse. All foreigners, missionaries included, were compelled to seek the seacoast, where they could be under the protection of the foreign warships. In vain did the Sultan try, by every stratagem he knew, to overcome the rebellious tribesmen. His ablest military leaders were defeated and his army, poor at the best, became discouraged and discontented. One of the main causes of the rebellion was the opposition of the Moorish tribesmen to foreign influence, which had become very powerful at Fez and Tangier, since the present sovereign ascended the throne. They believed the Sultan to be dominated by his foreign advisers, and they resented many of the innovations that had taken place in the capital, as hostile to the traditions and best interests of the Moorish people. At the last, hopeless of subduing the rebels in the field, the Sultan yielded to advice and sent away the foreigners. But, as it now proves, his compliance came too late. Instead of being satisfied, the rebels were apparently more determined than ever to overthrow the government.

A QUAINT OLD CURIO SHOP IN TANGIER

In view of the long-continued and futile struggle in Morocco, France, with the concurrence of the European Powers, has undertaken the work of pacification. It will, however, be really a work of conquest. An expeditionary force of 26,000 French troops will be employed in subduing the refractory tribesmen, and when this is accomplished, the government will probably be a protectorate, under French control. It is not difficult to foresee that the ultimate fate of Morocco and its people will be that of Algiers or Egypt.

Missionary Frederick Weiss, of the Tangier American Mission, who was recently home on furlough, has how returned to Morocco. He sends the following letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"On my return to Tangier I find that the trouble here between the Sultan and the rebels is far from being settled. While I was still in the bay of Tangier, I could see on the shore, great clouds of smoke rising up into the sky, this was only a short distance from Tangier. On inquiring what it meant, I was told by some of the missionaries who met me on the shore, that the Sultan's soldiers were encamped outside of Tangier, and were burning the homes of the people. These homes are common grass huts, and as it has not rained here for several months, it only takes a match to light the fire, and in a short time a village of a hundred huts will be lying in ashes.

"The manner of warfare practiced is to march through the offending country, to burn the villages, to pillage and to kill everyone they come across. But it must not be thought that the tribes offer no resistance to the uninvited presence of the Sultan's troops; on the contrary, they fight until they can fight no more. Those who are captured usually have their heads cut off. The Sultan, a few days ago, lost in this way some of his very best Kaids. Seven were surrounded, as they were marching to join the Sultan's main army, each Kaid having under him a company of men. These were all attacked from ambush by the rebels; the seven Kaids were killed, with eighty men. The others fought until they could beat their way out of the trap they had got into.

"In the Moorish army the soldiers are certainly a wild lot. Whatever of order and regulation exists among them is due to the energy and untiring attention of a Scotchman, Kaid Maclean, who for many years has exiled himself from civilization and followed the fortunes of the Sultan's armies. The soldiers are armed, for the most part, with repeating rifles. Their uniform consists, or is supposed to consist, of a red tunic with yellow braid, blue baggy trousers reaching to the knees, and a crimson cap, with a blue tassel fastened on top and hanging down on the side of the head. However, this costume is much varied. Some have sold or lost parts of their uniforms; some wear yellow shoes while others wear black shoes. Then, with their trousers coming up to their knees, they wear socks. These all vary in color, some being white, though they look everything else but white, for they have not been washed for many a day. Others wear blue, black, or red. The soldier's pay is small, and from this he has to supply his rations. When he goes to war he makes up his pay by pillage and robbery. The poor country people fear the soldiers more than they do any other class of people; for when they march through the country they help themselves to anything that comes in their way.

"During these warlike days, the missionaries do ve little work in the country, for it is not a safe thing be in the villages. One cannot tell what will happen any part, for the country is in an unsettled state. W all long to see it quiet once more, so that we may g out among the country people, for they seem to be much easier to reach. Most of them are very po and they are often surprised that any one should p any attention to their needs.

"There are many Moors in the towns, who are heari the words of life from the missionaries in their resp tive places. One who is active and on the alert can ways find a place to fill in the precious hours in doi valiant-hearted service for the Master in home a foreign lands. The market-place always affords a go place for doing good. I am sending some interesti pictures taken at a market-place. Here one sees posed for sale all manner of native ware. Auctionee run screaming up and down among the crowd, selli rugs, second-hand native clothing, so the tourist ofte is amazed on coming into the market-place. Wome sit veiled and cross-legged, selling clothing and blanket In another quarter is the market for horses and do keys, and here the auctioneer gallops up and dow crying out the latest bid. Another quarter is give over to the sellers of wheat and barley. In other dire tions may be seen the snake-charmers, the story-telle from everywhere, "powder play" by the mountaineer a Hamdouchi hacking holes in his head with a battl axe, etc.

"We thank you and your readers for the help you hav been to our work in the past, and we are confident th you will not forget to pray and help us in the future.

MACEDONIA'S HOPELESS STRUGGLE

Terrible Barbarities by Turkish Troops

EXPECTATIONS of intervention by the European Powers in Macedonia, for the purpose of putting an end to the massacre of the defenceless non-combatant Christian population l the destruction of peaceful villages, have not been lized. To the horrors of war will soon have to be led, in all likelihood, the visitation of a widespread mine. For many weeks past the agricultural part of cedonia has been overrun by the Sultan's troops, nding crops have been destroyed, and the greater solved to make the effort to succor some of the famishing, and, even at the peril of their own lives, will travel in the interior of the vilayet of Monastir with that object. They have advised the American Board officials at home that there is no present opportunity for relief work which would justify an appeal to American charity.

There has been thus far no open declaration of war between Bulgaria and Turkey, but hostilities between the Turkish troops and insurgents continue on an undiminished scale in the north. In Adrianople vilayet sacred nearly the entire Christian population. 4,000 fugitives have reached Rila and taken refuge in a monastery. Several villages around Razlog are burning.

The Revolutionary Committee at Monastir report a long list of atrocities committed by the Turkish troops, including the ruthless slaughter of a number of children, who were hurled from high rocks. The Turks killed more than two hundred peasants in several villages, and while taking one hundred and sixty villagers as prisoners to Nevesilo, they slew seventy-five. At an

Near the Bulgarian frontier, several encounters between insurrectionists and Turkish regulars are reported. "Donor's" Problem

"IN the multitude of counselors there is safety," says the proverb, and if we may assume that the counsel afforded in the many letters addressed to "Donor" is wise in proportion to its abundance, there is a hope that he may be materially assisted by their perusal. There are thousands of good men and women throughout the land who find themselves confronted by a problem similar to that which "Donor" has so plainly set forth. They feel it to be their duty to consecrate a certain portion of their means to the Lord's work. It may be only a few hundred dollars, or at most a few thousands; for the great majority are doubtless men and women of average means, and what they possess has very likely been saved during long years of thrift and economy. They may wisely desire to put it to the best use, in their own life-time, instead of leaving it to be administered by executors; for it is undeniable that there is a rare pleasure in observing the progress of some simple project of benevolence or humanitarian work, as it grows under one's own hand. It may be a Rescue work, dealing with the unfortunates who have made shipwreck of life, or a work whose aim is to brighten the sad life of neglected childhood. It may be the watering and tending of some mission in a far-away land where souls are to be won for the Master, or the evangelizing of our own remote frontiers. It may be a sympathetic work among the friendless aged, who have been thrust aside by the world, or the carrying forward of some long-cherished project for the moral and material purification of a neighborhood where sin abounds and grace has been a stranger. There are struggling churches to strengthen and establish, widows and orphans to help, the homeless to shelter, the sick to visit and comfort, the prisoner to cheer, the unfortunate to assist and encourage. Altogether, outside of the domain of purely secular philanthrophy—which we need not consider now—there are many ways in which a Christian man or woman can devote surplus means, with the assurance that the Divine blessing will rest on the gift.

But the problem of a choice is not one to be settled by outside advice, however sincere. In undertaking any special mission for the Master, it should be to the Christian a very precious privilege to wait upon God, and inquire of his will concerning it. Then the path of duty will become clear, and we will enter upon it with gladness and enthusiasm.

To many other inquirers who have asked THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to advise them, as "Donor" has done, we have invariably given the same answer: Familiarize yourself, as far as possible, with the claims of the various causes that have presented themselves, and with the character and results of the work; then take the whole matter in prayer to Him who alone can lead you to a wise decision. Although this journal is actively interested in various benevolent and philanthropic enterprises (some of which, like our children's work at Mont-Lawn and the Bowery Rescue Mission, are mentioned with favor by many of "Donor's" correspondents), we have refrained from pressing their claims to special consideration, as we prefer, in such cases, that the nature and results of the work accomplished should be their own best advocate. Whatever our patrons, in their generous recognition of these benevolences, may do toward their support, is a cause for gratification. But to "Donor," as to all others, we repeat that the momentous problem of the investment of any considerable amount for the Lord's work is one which ought to be decided, under Divine guidance, by the giver and by no other. Think over it, and pray to be led to a right decision, for upon the wisdom of the choice may depend the winning or losing of immortal souls.

The New Child Labor Laws

WHEN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, a year ago, published the results of its investigation into the child-labor system in the Pennsylvania mines and the New Jersey mills, the attention of a very large class of thoughtful Americans was drawn to the evil, and there was a widespread demand for remedial legislation. But on looking over the field again, if was found that those two States were by no means the sole offenders against the rising generation. Other States were included in the list of those that were "consenting parties" to the enslavement and debasement of their own children. New York was a glaring offender; for, while in some Southern or Western State, hundreds of poor boys and girls were to be found wearing out their lives in mills and mines, in the Empire State there were thousands growing up to a weak and degenerate manhood or womanhood, uneducated, and denied all the pleasures and privileges that are the rightful inheritance of the American child.

Popular indignation at the system in New York crystallized in the passages of Child Labor Laws, which took effect on Oct. 1, of this year, and which are of far-reaching importance.. Twenty thousand children, under fourteen and fifteen, were working in the factories of New York State. Settlements, churches, medical societies and philanthropic organizations all united in the demand for these remedial laws. By their permission, no child under fourteen shall be put to work, a birth certificate being required as evidence of age. In certain callings the minimum age is sixteen, and the maximum time of labor nine hours daily. Regular sanitary inspection is to be made of all establishments employing children. In some respects the new laws are open to criticism. The nine-hour work-day is too long for a child, and it might well have been made lighter; but taken as a whole, the new child-labor laws have placed New York far in the van in the reform movement.

Let us hope that other States—especially New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts—will fall into line in the new movement, and that those Southern States in which child-labor is now a crying evil, will also see fit, during the coming legislative session, to pass such laws as are needed for the protection of childhood. Every boy or girl, born under the American flag, is entitled to the privileges of education, and to the free and innocent enjoyment of those early years, which, in too many sections of our Union, are now devoted to slavish toil, to the detriment of body and brain, and the blighting of manly and womanly character. Reared in ignorance and trained to hard and unremunerative labor, they reach adult age through a long and dismal transit of semi-slavery, with few or none of the developing and inspiring influences that other children enjoy. This is the fault of the State, which should make such conditions impossible. Such training need not be expected to produce the best type of citizens, but rather the reverse. Our Christian civilization demands that we deal with this question regardless of individuals, and with a single eye to the highest interests of the whole nation. Let us do justice to the children by removing this national reproach.

An Ominous Condition

A FACT that is of evil omen to the future welfare of our country, was stated a few days ago by Chancellor Henry M. McCracken, in his address at the opening of the term of the New York University. He "deplored the fact that freshmen, as a rule, are grossly ignorant of the Bible." That characteristic is in all senses deplorable, and there is reason to fear that in our colleges, there is little prospect of their ignorance being enlightened. The courses of study there are generally secular, and leave little time or opportunity for Bible study. This ignorance is bad for the men themselves, and it is bad for the country. When we remember that it is from college graduates that the men are chiefly drawn, who will be our Presidents, Legislators, Judges, and social and political leaders, we realize how serious a thing it is that they should enter on their duties, in any degree ignorant of the truths and principles of the Word of God. They may prove to be men of learning and men of honor, but the surest guarantee we could have of their rectitude and sound principle, is that they may have that sense of accountability to God, which they gain only from an acquaintance with his Word.

Why have these young men neglected Bible study? Apart from the saving knowledge it imparts, apart from the fact that through it alone can they hope to gain eternal life, it is the book of all others that is capable of giving them the wisdom they need for this life. Its history teems with illustrations of life more fascinating and more instructive than any other historical record; its poetry is grander and more thrilling than that produced by uninspired men; and the wisdom of philosophy has been proved and tested by millions, who have made it the guide of their lives. In neglecting Bible, they have missed the most valuable of all aid eminence and usefulness.

Who is at fault? Chancellor MacCracken distrib the blame among parents, clergymen and school-te ers. It is, however, on the first of these that the sponsibility chiefly rests. In how many homes to has the practice, once well-nigh universal, of gat ing the children and servants to family worship m ing and evening, fallen into abeyance? We have m our lives too strenuous. The business of money- ting has been allowed to absorb our time until the v ing hours are all too short for complying with the mands of the office, the store and the factory. E the mother has now so many social functions to form in addition to her household duties, that she no time to read a chapter with her children and plain it to them. No wonder that the boy who n sees a Bible in the hands of his father or mother, gr up in ignorance of its contents.

The clergyman is not always wholly free from bla It cannot be expected of him that in the brief tim his disposal in the Sunday services he can do muc enlighten the youthful mind. Too often his young ditors must sit under his ministrations much as yo heathens listening to a language they cannot un stand. But something might be done by organiz Bible classes which might be made so interesting a attract juvenile audiences and so incite them to a st of the sacred volume. Little is to be hoped from school-teachers. We have so tied their hands, in of their teaching doctrinal error, that they have sr opportunity of teaching fundamental truth.

The situation, however, as described by Dr. M Cracken, and has doubtless been observed by heads colleges in other districts, is so fraught with danger dividual, social and national, that it is a bugle cal duty. Parents and clergymen should immediately earnestly take the matter in hand, that the reproach Bible ignorance may be removed.

Swiftest Conveyance in the World

THE development of the electric railway has reached such a point that a car recently traveled in Germany at the remarkable rate of 117 miles an hour. This means that its speed was nearly twice that ever attained by the fastest steam railroad train in the world. The trip was made over one of the government railroads of Prussia, which has been rebuilt purposely for tests of this kind. It is between the suburbs of Berlin and the town of Zossen, and is about sixteen miles in length. Over a year ago, experiments were conducted when a car was driven from one end to the other at the rate of about 100 miles an hour, but it was found that the rails were not heavy enough to repeat this rate of speed safely, and the track was rebuilt with rails weighing 100 pounds to the yard, and laid in a bed of cement. The car shown in the photograph weighs nearly 100 tons, this weight being necessary to keep it from leaving the track while running at full speed. The electric motors are the largest powerful ever built for such a purpose, aggregating nearly 1,000 horse-power. The current is supplied by three different wires, one wire being insufficient to produce the enormous voltage needed. The experiments are being made at the request of the German government. Other countries will surely adopt the same system if this report is verified, for there is everywhere the same demand for the highest rate of speed in travel, even though it may involve increased danger to life and limb. The ancient prophet long ago foresaw that this would be the tendency of the human race in modern times:

"The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightning (Nahum 2: 4).

Resuscitating Pearls

Jewelers have long complained of the losses they sustain by the fading or dying, as they call it, of the finest pearls. The pink glints in them disappear, and the pearl becomes gray and dull. Private owners of famous pearls have made the same complaint, and have seen with dismay, gems, which originally cost large sums, grow sick and eventually lose all value. News now comes from Hinckley, N. Y., in a report to the New York Times, that a remedy for the trouble has been discovered. A jeweler doing business there, has given much time and study to the subject, and now announces his discovery. It appears that while passing a vacation on Moose River, he noticed a number of large mussels, and examined them carefully. A few of the largest he brought away with him, and placed them in a spring containing large quantities of limestone. After two weeks he took them out, and placed a diseased pearl in the mantle lobes of each mussel. He restored the mussels to the spring, and let them lie there for several weeks. On examining them again, he found to his joy that all the pearls were regaining their lustre. He restored the mussels with their pearls to the spring, and again waited several weeks. On taking them out again recently, he found that they had completely recovered and regained all their lost tints. It is much to be wished that in spiritual maladies the same principle were adopted. Go to resort to the methods by which the pearl was produced, in order to restore its fading life, is a rational course, and would assuredly succeed in cases in which the spiritual life is declining in a man's soul.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there? Why then is not the health of the daughter of my people recovered (Jer. 8: 22)?

A Tragic Search

A sad story was told at a Coroner's inquest in Chicago recently. The inquiry was as to the suicide of a girl eighteen years of age. Three years ago, in a quarrel with another girl, whom she supposed to be her sister, she was taunted with being a foundling. She was at first incredulous, and the woman whom she had all along regarded as her mother, evaded her questions. Finally, under persistent pressure, the woman admitted the fact, and told the girl the name of her real mother. Her explanation was that the mother and father had quarreled and were about to separate. The mother's difficulty was how to deal with her girl baby. After talking the matter over several times with her friend, it was agreed that the infant should be laid on the doorstep of her friend, who promised to find it and care for it. The plan was carried out. The child was taken into the family, and the mother left for another city. The father supposed his wife had taken the infant with her, and, having secured a divorce, made no inquiry after it. He died some years afterwards without knowing the whereabouts of his child. The mother had not been seen by the child's foster parents since her departure. The girl had grown up in ignorance of the circumstances, and not until the quarrel with her supposed sister had she any suspicion that she was not a member of the family. Having learned the name of her mother and gathered all the clues she could, she began a search for her, which she prosecuted for three years. She met with no success, though more than once she seemed on the verge of discovery. At last, weary and discouraged, she committed suicide. It then appeared that her mother had heard of her daughter's inquiries after her, and was actually on the way to her when the girl killed herself. Had she waited only three days longer, her mother would have clasped her in her arms. Thus, as so often appears, a wicked act is also a foolish act. A little more patience, and the girl would have had the desire of her heart. The resolve of the patriarch is a good example to all who are distracted by trouble and disappointment.

All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come (Job 14: 14).

A House Closed for Forty Years

The doors of a mansion in South Carolina were opened recently, which had been closed ever since the war. The story, as told in the local journals, is that, when the war broke out, the owner of the mansion had a severe mental struggle. He was a graduate of West Point and held a commission in the army. But though a Southerner by birth, and the descendant of men whose names were illustrious in Southern history, his associations had been with the North, and he had married a lady of a famous New York family. He was tenderly devoted to her, and she exerted a great influence upon her husband. Naturally, she was loyal to the Union, but her husband could not bring himself to make war upon the State in which he was born, and in whose history his forefathers had written their names. When it became necessary for the young officer to make a final choice, he resigned his commission in the army, and, deploring the condition of civil strife, expatriated himself. He had no intention of quitting the United States for all time, and, as proof of that, he closed his home in Charleston without removing the furniture. The house was not opened again until more than forty years later, when the old furniture was found still in place, dust-covered and falling into decay. He had wandered about Europe listless and despondent, feeling that he ought to have taken part in the struggle on one side or the other. He felt ashamed of his course to his former friends, and gradually fell into a condition of melancholy, from which he never recovered. After his death, his widow could not bear to return, and now she also is dead, and the deserted house has been opened by the heirs. It had been a sad and sorrowful life for the man who could not bring himself to take either side in the trouble. How many there are who are thus wrecking their lives by indecision in spiritual matters, not enjoying the world, yet not coming out openly for Christ, and the end is still more deplorable.

Every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God (1 John 4: 3).

A House Transformed

An extraordinary change has taken place in the use to which a large double house in Thirty-second street, New York, has been put. It was formerly known as the House of All Nations, and its reputation extended over the whole country, and was well known in Europe through its visitors. Fifteen years ago it was fitted up in the most elaborate and most pernicious fashion as a haunt of vice, and since that time it has changed under a succession of owners. It is now the property of a notorious gambler who is serving a term in Sing Sing, though, according to common belief, he is a millionaire. Though the recent activity of the police under the reform administration of the city, it has become impossible to conduct the house in the open and shameless manner of former years, and it is said, also, that the owner has experienced, while in prison, a change of mind, and desires to atone for his misdeeds. From one cause or the other, or both, a complete transformation of the house was determined on. It was offered to a Roman Catholic sisterhood, which is engaged in rescue work and in caring for unemployed servant girls. The sisterhood was informed that it might have a lease of the house at a nominal rental. As it is a large house, extending through a whole block to the street on the north, and would easily fetch on the market half a million dollars with its furniture, the sisterhood gladly accepted the offer, and has taken possession. Few changes have as yet been made in it, but evidences of its changed character are everywhere seen. The Umbrella Room, so called from the shape of its ceiling, was formerly the wine room, and its walls are frescoed with drinking scenes, but it is now the chapel of the sisterhood, and has at one end the usual Roman Catholic altar. The old Egyptian and Turkish parlors, separated by slender pillars, the walls covered by precious damask, is now used as the dining room. The Hall of Mirrors is now a work room in which sewing is done under experienced teachers. Up and down the solid oak staircase, with its elaborately carved balustrade, poor girls go about their work or on errands of mercy. Every one must rejoice that religion and philanthropy in any form are taking the place in the house once devoted to vice and impurity. We wish the change had gone further, and that the pure Gospel could have been the law of the house, but Christ's rule justifies us in being thankful that the effort is being made by any one to raise and redeem the fallen.

Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbad him, because he walketh not with us. And Jesus said, Forbid him not: for he that is not against us is for us (Luke 9: 49).

A NOTABLE WORKINGMEN'S BIBLE-CLASS

H. G. WORTHINGTON JOHN R. HAGUE REV. A. C. DIXON DANIEL S. FORD W. K. ANDEN

WHEN visitors to Boston ask to be directed to the largest and most progressive Sunday School in the city, they are invariably told to go to the Ruggles Street Baptist Sunday School.

It is in the most thickly populated tenement-house section of the Roxbury district. The church building, and the adjoining chapel and industrial school buildings, are as unpretentious as they are inadequate to the needs of the work carried on there, and the pastor of the church, Rev. A. C. Dixon, is doing everything within his power to have a building erected that will provide the facilities needed for the work this church and Sunday School have to do.

This church was for many years the recipient of the bounty of the late Daniel S. Ford, the millionaire publisher. During the later years of his life, he expended as much as $35,000 a year in carrying forward the missionary and benevolent work of the church and Sunday School. He made provision in his will for a permanent income of about $20,000 for the continuance of the work he had established and developed; but none of this money is applied to the general expenses of the church, and as the membership is composed almost entirely of poor people, the raising of funds for general expense means a great deal of self-sacrifice. How great this self-sacrifice is, is known only to those familiar with the lives of the people who form the greater part of the membership of the church and Sunday School.

Last year the enrollment of the school was 1,579, and this did not include the Home Department, which had 598 members at the beginning of 1903, making a total membership of 2,177. The average attendance last year at the regular sessions of the school was 955. The Superintendent, Mr. W. K. Andem, gives his entire time to the work of the school, and is salaried. He has a stenographer and two salaried assistants, with an office in the chapel. Some of them may be found there from eight until five o'clock, daily. Both church and Sunday School have parish visitors, who spend their entire time in going about the parish, doing good, and making calls on the sick and needy, conducting cottage or home prayer-meetings, reading the Bible to the sick, praying with the dying, and comforting the bereaved.

There are also mothers' class Chinese classes, "cradle rolls," n mal classes, and a large kinderg ten connected with the Sund School. That missionary spir runs high, may be known from t fact that last year the school ga $1,000 for the support of two m sionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Beaman, China. THE LITTLE CHRISTIAN MARTYR OF SMYRNA*

IT was in the fateful ages, when the Christian martyrs died,
And the gods of high Olympus in their glory were defied—
When throughout the Roman Empire there were festivals and feasts,
Where great Jupiter was lauded by the pontiff and his priests.
It was in the tragic ages, that with bacchanalian songs
Through the streets of ancient Smyrna surged one day the maddened throngs.
"Find us Polycarp, the Christian!" rose the wild, discordant cries:
"To the lions with the Christians! By the gods of Rome he dies!
Drag him forth to the arena! Let the beasts devour their prey,
If he swear not, by great Cæsar, to forsake the Christ this day."

So the mob, in growing fury, surged the streets with swelling roar;
But the Bishop good of Smyrna found they not at any door.
It was then a soldier pointed to a sunny-headed child,
On whose boyish face the beauty of a dozen summers smiled,
"Ask of him," the ruffian shouted; "Ask the lad, he knows him well;
In his home the man sought refuge; ask the lad, and he shall tell."

So they turned like wolves upon him, fierce for prey, and hunger-mad.
And he stood, a lamb among them, though a lion-hearted lad.
"Knowest thou of any Christians? Where can Polycarp be found?"
Cried a Roman soldier fiercely, as upon the child he frowned.
And the boy his pale face lifted, with his fearless, fair blue eyes,
In whose depths life's hopes were dawning like the morn in cloudless skies;
And there seemed a sudden halo round the brave but youthful head;
"If thou seekest but for Christians, I am one," he fearless said.

Traditional Scene of the Martyrdom of Polycarp in Ephesus

"What! ho! ho! thou bold-tongued nursling," cried the first with fiercer frown,
"Make no boasts, or, by Olympus! thou shalt burn e'er sun go down!
Lead us hence! We seek thy Bishop Polycarp, that evil knave;
Dare refuse us, to the lions thou shalt go, and naught shall save!"
Then the boy's face flushed indignant; "Call him not knave!" he cried,
"He is Smyrna's Bishop, servant of the Saviour Christ that died."
Then a cruel arm uplifted smote him quickly to the ground,
And the soldiers, mad with fury, gathered eagerly around.
"Fool! Thy hasty blow hath slain him," cried a guard "was too soon."
"'Way!" another sneering answered, "drag him forth; he doth but swoon.
Doth he think to move our pity by his tears and weaklir cries?
Drag him forth! His lips shall answer, or from worse tha this he dies.

"See! he moves, he is but feigning. He shall tell us all h knows.
What? Defeated by this youngling, we, who brave th fiercest foes?
Now then, speak—thou stubborn traitor—where shall Poly carp be found?
Say the truth, lad, or thou diest as thou liest on th ground."

Then a gleam of saintly beauty lit the simple, childish face,
And the look of pain and anguish to a heavenly calm gav place.
"He ye seek to slay is noble, and he serves the Christ tha died.
Kill me if you will, but never will I tell where he dot hide."

Turn away, O ye that witnessed, ye who saw that deadl blow—
Was it man that struck, or demon? Answer not—God' angels know.
So the awful lot was chosen; so the cruel tale was told,
And that even, when the sunset crowned old Smyrna's hil with gold,
On his weeping mother's bosom, with the stroke that death hath given,
Lay the bruised and martyred body, but the spirit was in heaven.

*This beautiful poem, by an unknown author, has been sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Miss Edith Scott, a reader of this journal. Polycarp was a distinguished father of the early Christian church. He was of Eastern origin, and in his youth had been a slave. He was purchased by Callisto, a Christian lady, and liberated and trained and educated as a Christian. Polycarp's martyrdom occurred A. D. 155, in the reign of Antoninus Titus.

What Shall "Donor" Do with his.. $5,000?

A DELUGE OF REPLIES TO THIS MOST INTERESTING QUESTION

N our issue of September 23, there was printed a letter from an aged friend, who desired advice as to the best method of disposing of $5,000 in such a way that the best use may be made of it now and hereafter for the advancement of Christ's Kingdom" and the good of humanity. That letter we submitted to our readers, inviting them to forward suggestions freely. Their responses have come in great numbers, and have been sent to the writer of the original question. We are privileged to publish below some of the most interesting bits of advice given to "Donor," who could certainly have little difficulty, with such a multitude of earnest counselors, in reaching a wise decision.

I will plead for my people and say—send a missionary to these poor Yuma Indians. I am not of their tribe, but I am an Indian, and know how much they need to be christianized. They are a very poor tribe, the only help they get from the government, is that their children are educated. Very little progress has been made, as they have to go back to the reservation with nothing else to encourage them. One of their customs is to cremate their dead, and to show them grief they burn everything they own, house, and even the very last stitch they have on. Of course, as long as they do that, they never have anything, and are always in poverty.

COVERED SIN

DAVID'S JOY OVER FORGIVENESS

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR OCT. 25
PSALM 32

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT — "BLESSED IS HE WHOSE TRANSGRESSION IS FORGIVEN, WHOSE SIN IS COVERED." PSALM 32: 1

THIS psalm is divided by Professor Moulton into seven stanzas which represent seven stations of forgiveness. 1st. The blessedness of being forgiven, vs. 1, 2. 2d. Vain efforts at peace while the sin is self-covered, vs. 3, 4. 3d. Peace through confession and forgiveness, v. 5. 4th. David's experience brings hope to all, v. 6. 5th. One blessing of the forgiven is safety, v. 7. 6th. Another blessing is guidance, vs. 8, 9. 7th. An exhortation, vs. 10, 11.

I am a woman who has two illustrious brothers, one a priest and the other a lawgiver. I became associated with them in their responsibilities as a prophetess. The lawgiver was the prominent member of our trio. My other brother and myself became jealous of him, and we spoke against him to the people. Thereupon the Lord called us to account, and upon me he sent leprosy as a sore punishment because I was the leader in the evil speaking. I spent seven days in sorrow and repentance shut away with other lepers. The foul disease pictured my sin as it looked to God. Then I came to the joy of forgiveness and restoration. What is my name? Num. 12.

I am a woman who grievously sinned; but when I saw Jesus Christ and heard him talk, a desire to lead a pure life was awakened in my soul. One day I followed him into a house of feasting. I had carried with me a box of precious ointment that I might anoint his feet. Scornful looks were cast upon me by the guests at the feast as I knelt down at the feet of Jesus, and washed them with my tears, and wiped them with my long hair, and bathed them with the perfume. Simon, the master of the feast, had unkind thoughts about me, which Jesus knew without hearing them spoken, and rebuked him, by reminding him that he had done no such loving act for his guest. And then he told Simon that I loved much because much had been forgiven me. Luke 7: 37–50.

The joy of forgiveness came to me in the last hour of my life. Up to that time I had been a thief. I was suffering the death penalty for my sins, when repentance took hold on me, and I called upon the Lord Jesus Christ to save me, and he did. You can read my story in Luke 23: 39–43.

* * *

I was a man above thirty years old, when it was discovered to me that my life was wrong. I had been educated religiously as a Jew, and felt in duty bound to persecute the sect called Christians. But a voice from heaven, the voice of Jesus himself, called me to account. I had thought I was doing right in opposing Christ, but I saw at last that one may sin and yet be sincere, and I can now understand King David's prayer, "Cleanse thou me from hidden faults." To the end of my life I preached forgiveness of sins through Jesus Christ. What is my name? Acts, chapter 9.

"GREAT WATERS SHALL NOT COME NIGH UNTO HIM"

I belong to a nation gone wrong. We allowed the House of God to be closed, and so deserted did it become, that it was a safe hiding-place for those whose lives were hunted. (II. Kings 11: 2). We became a nation of drunkards. We had little or no regard for the Sabbath. We forsook the Lord our God and worshiped idols. For all these sins God permitted us to be taken captive and carried to far away lands, while our own good lands were laid waste. We had seventy years in which to repent and turn again to our God. Then came the joy of forgiveness and of going back to rebuild God's temple and our homes. Upwards of 42,000 of us returned richly laden with gifts of gold and silver and other precious things to aid us in carrying out our plans. What people are we? Ezra, chaps. 1, 2 and 3.

Application and Illustration

In the form of an Address to Children on Covered Sin

Blessed is he whose trangression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Psalm 32: 1.

Behind this hymn-book, I have written a story-book without words. You have seen blank note-books without words, but did you ever see a story-book without words? We say a great many things every day without words. When mother beckons with her hand, you know it means "Come," and I hope you always come promptly. And when father shakes his head, you know he means "No," and I hope you never act as if you thought it could be twisted into "Yes," by teasing. That would be dishonoring your father, which the Bible forbids.

A little boy, for a trick, pointed his finger to the wrong road, when a man asked him which way the doctor went. As a result, the man missed the doctor, and his little boy died, because the doctor came too late to take a fishbone from his throat. At the funeral, the minister said that the little boy was killed by a lie, which another boy told not with his tongue but with his finger.

It has been said that a slammed door is sometimes a "wooden oath." How many things the bells say! You know the meaning of the door bell, the church bell, the fire bell, and of many street bells! And the language of flags and of colors is yet more complete. In a mission for railway men in England, a card is given out containing these words:

> White for right, and red for wrong,
> And green for safety, and go along.

The story-book without words that I have tells in colors of a life. "Mother," said little Charlie, "Will Hardin says his mother writes books." "Does she?" said mother, and then she went on sewing. "Mother," said Charlie presently, "is it very hard to write a book?" "I don't know, I'm sure," said mother. "I'm going to write a book," said this small man in petticoats. Just then the door-bell rang, and Charlie's mother went to see a caller. When she came back her little boy was sitting on her footstool, busily writing in a handsome book; but as he wrote with a slate-pencil it did not do the book any harm. "Now, mother," said her little boy, "I'm done my book." "No," said his mother, thinking a little while, "you are not near done. God has given you a book to write. I hope it is a big, long one, full of beautiful stories." "What is the name of my book?" he asked, coming close to her. "Its name is Charlie's Life; you can only write one page a day, and you must be very careful not to have any black marks in it by doing ugly things. When you pout and cry, that smears your page, but when you help mother, and keep a bright face, and don't quarrel with Teddy, that makes a nice, fair page, with pretty pictures on it." "And when will I be done writing that book?" asked Charlie. "When God sees that your book is long enough," answered mother, "he will send an angel to shut its covers, and put a clasp on it, until the great day when all our life-books shall be opened and read." Charlie sat very quiet awhile, and then said softly, "Dear little Lucy finished writing her book when they put her in the white casket, and laid the white roses over her." "Yes," said his mother; "her life-book was just a little hymn of praise to God, its pages all clean and white, with no stains on them." Charlie looked up and saw two tear-drops fall on mother's work, but they were bright tears, and a bright smile came with them.

"BE GLAD IN THE LORD AND REJOICE"

The leaves of the story-book without words, as you see, are all heart-shaped to signify it is the story of a heart. When I close this hymn-book can I read what is in it? Can anybody? Yes, God reads closed books and silent hearts. Jesus, the Son of God, told the woman of Samaria all the sins she thought hidden, and made her wish to have her sins really covered by forgiveness. The first outside cover page on our heart book is pure white, picturing childhood before any known sin has been done. Probably every child here has passed beyond that white chapter. I have asked children in great meetings in many countries, after time for solemn heart-searching, "Is there any boy or girl present that never said a naughty word, never did a naughty thing?" and only once were any hands raised, and the other children all felt the two who did in that one case raise their hands, did so not because they were good, but because they were not paying attention to the question.

The second and third heart pages of our book are black, picturing sin as it looks to God, and the "many sorrows that shall be to the wicked" (Psa. 32: 10; Isa. 64: 6; Rom. 3: 10; 5: 12). "Mother calls me good," said a young girl to her teacher, "and father calls me good, but I am not good. When I don't dare to say and do bad things, I think them and wish them. How can I be clean inside of me?" The next two pages of scarlet answer the question (Heb. 9: 11–28; I. Peter 1: 18, 19; Rev. 5: 9). When we turn to the red page the black is all under the red, the past is all under the blood. When we attempt to cover our sins we are miserable, in the fear they may be at any moment uncovered (Prov. 28: 13). A murderer who had escaped arrest for fifteen years was at last found and arrested, and declared his first night in prison the happiest he had spent in all that time, because he had been in constant fear that the sin he had covered would be uncovered. But when God has covered our sins with the cross on which Christ died for us there is a supreme joy such as David sang out in his psalm of forgiveness. Our sins are not merely covered—the record of them is blotted out.

"A boy ran to his mother one day after he had read the promise, 'I will blot out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions and he said: 'Mother, what does God mean when he says he will blot out my sins? What is he going to do with them? I can't see how God can really blot them out and put them away. What does it mean—blot out?' The mother, who always the best theologian for a child, said to the boy 'Didn't I see you yesterday writing on your slate?' 'Yes,' he said. 'Well, show it to me.' He brought his slate to his mother, who, holding it in front of him, said, 'Where is what you wrote?' 'Oh!' he said, 'I rubbed it out.' 'Well, where is it?' 'Why, mother, I don't know.' 'But how could you put it away if it was really there?' 'Oh, mother, I don't know. I know it was there, and it is gone.' 'Well,' she said, 'that is what God meant when he said, I will blot out thy transgressions.'"

The next two heart pages are white, not the whiteness of innocence, but of cleansing from sin (II. Cor. 5: 21; Rom. 3: 21, 22; 10: 4). The red page covering the black may re present acquittal of the guilt of sin through the blood of him who died for us; but if one is only acquitted and the love of sin remains, he will go forth to sin again and again. Hence God gives us the double promise (I. John 1: 9). "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us"—that is what the white page signifies—cleansing from the very love of sin, such a change of heart that we love what God loves and hate what God hates. The next two heart pages are of gold, representing the joy of forgiveness and of faithfulness in this world, such as David sings in this thirty-second Psalm (Psa. 32: 11; Isa. 61: 10).

> If we believed, we should arise and sing,
> Dropping our burdens at his pierced feet;
> Sorrow would flee, and weariness take wing,
> Hard things grow fair, and bitter waters sweet.
> If we believed, what room for fear or care,
> Within his arms, safe sheltered on his breast?
> Peace for our pain and hope for our despair,
> Is what he meant who said: "I give thee rest."
> MARY LOWE DICKINSON.

The last outside cover heart page is of a heavenly blue. An earnest Christian worker was once traveling on a train, when he seized an opportunity to walk around among the passengers and distribute a pocketful of tracts. One of the passengers refused, and taking a race-card out of his pocket, held it up, saying: "you see this? That's my religion." "Is it, my friend?" "Yes," he replied. "I suppose you have a good many of those cards?" "Oh, yes, I have them pinned all over my mantel-piece." "Well, then, go and collect as many more as you can; pin them all around your room, and when the doctor tells you that you only have ten minutes to live, take them all down, count them over, and see what your religion is worth." They sat quiet, the one in silent prayer, the other in anxious thought. When the Christian man reached his station and had risen to leave the car, the man with the race-card said: "I say, you can give me one of those papers, if you will.

> Thou who badst the sinner cease
> From her tears and go in peace—
> Thou who to the dying thief
> Spoke pardon and relief—
> Thou, O Lord, to me hast given,
> E'en to me the hope of heaven.

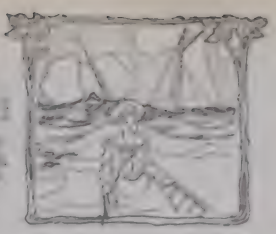
Our Household Circle



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Boy in his Teens

AMONG the perplexing questions which assail the mother at a certain point in the home history, the one at the top of this paragraph is most insistent. A lad between fifteen and eighteen has arrived at a place where his life is beset with difficulties. Transitions are proverbially embarrassing. When a boy resents being called "Master So-and-So," yet is not sufficiently grown up to be addressed as "Mister So-and-So," there are moments of awkwardness for all concerned. The tactful mother or sister knows how to smooth these away, and so does the well-bred young woman a few years older than the boy, who can talk to him on the subjects he likes, without obvious effort or offensive patronage, and who recognizes his dawning manhood and never wounds his self-esteem. No wonder that boys in their teens feel an almost worshipful adoration for girls a little older, and for beautiful women in their twenties. They are the only beings, their mothers excepted, who take the trouble to understand boys. Fathers, elder brothers, and men in general, either purposely or through heedlessness, snub the hobbledehoy, treat him with arrogance, and heedlessly ignore the fact that he is slipping the sheet of childhood and stepping forward to the levels where they already stand. This may be done from an instinct of self-preservation, for youth, though it now and then suffer repulse, carries the banner of conquest, and will bear all before it to-morrow. The man of to-day knows full well, that the boys who are coming on, are an advancing host, bound sooner or later to crowd him and his comrades from their places of vantage. Strangely enough, a father sometimes feels this, when he looks at his tall young sons.

But the mother never feels it. Not she. Her attitude toward her boys is one of pride, and she longs to let every friend see them as she does.

A boy in his teens is often shy and retiring, often clumsy, often ill at ease in society. He sidles out of the room when company enters. He goes off to the barn, or hangs about corners of the streets with his boy friends. Girls are alarming creatures, and he keeps out of their way. How shall he be coaxed from the diffidence and reserve that are his shield, and yet make him appear forbidding and awkward?

Certainly not by direct attacks upon the defects of his temperament, or the immaturity of his character.

A mother does well to accustom her boys to being her escorts when she goes out. Women are apt to be unwisely independent. They lose some very precious things by their lack of—shall we say, selfishness—by their failure to claim the courtesies due their sex. A mother, a sister, should never go out alone in the evening, when there is a son or a brother under the same roof. Even if such going forth be perfectly safe and proper, she should expect Joe or Frank to attend her. Gallantry is on the wane, because women in the home claim so little from boys and men who love them, and should wait upon them with knightly devotion, even in trifles.

If a mother take her young sons out with her, they will unconsciously learn the little ways of social grace. They will cease to be hobbledehoys, and become young gentlemen.

Next, let the anxious mother provide for her sons pleasant girl companions, encouraging a healthful intercourse, which never trends toward the dangerous ground of love. Young people ought to enjoy each other's society in the years that precede the twenties, without a single thought of anything except good comradeship. They should go together in groups, rather than by twos, and mothers have it in their power to forward agreeable acquaintance between their sons and daughters, and those of others, and to promote innocent merry-makings. Fun and frolic belong to youth, and laughter then "doeth good like a medicine."

The self-conscious, possibly timorous boy, has his counterpart and opposite in the self-conceited and over-aggressive lad, who often arouses antagonism through his positive air of knowing all that is to be known. With this type of character, strong and determined, and likely to make its mark in the future, the mother's province is to exercise a little gentle repression. This boy must be curbed, held back, restrained, lest his impetuous rush be misunderstood, or his eager actions result in some perplexing complication. The time is passing swiftly. A little later, his energy and resolution will enable him to take an important place among the workers, if not among the leaders of the community. Now, though he make large demands on maternal patience, mother must stand beside her boy, straighten out his tangles, and make friends for him on every side.

This is a home question; mothers cannot ignore it. What they are doing for the hobbledehoy, they are doing for the nation's best men, in a period that rapidly approaches on the wings of time.

DRAWING IN THE CATCH

The bread of the Sea, right hardy are we, but we toil in the mist and the foam;
And it's glad we are, when the morning star is lighting our pathway home.

Shall Children Talk at the Table?

I once knew a learned judge, who was dignity itself on the bench. Lawyers approached him with formal respect. Culprits trembled before him. But in his home, the children knew neither awe nor reverence. He had married late in life, and before the wonder and the joy of offspring, his defences went down like chaff before a whirlwind. The children chattered like magpies at the table, and their parents repeated their bright sayings and permitted themselves to be rudely interrupted without the semblance of a reproof. When Frank threw a potato across the table, hitting his little brother and making him cry, mammadid interpose, and sent Frank howling out of the room. This was exceptional. If these children ever grew up into decency and tolerable grace, it was in spite of training, not because of it.

I know another household, that of a gentle mother and placid father, who erred in another extreme. Their children sat at meals like mutes at a funeral. They answered questions under breath. Their little faces looked as if, in the slang of the day, they were "scared stiff." As for asking for more, like Oliver Twist, not one of the five ever dared to do it; they simply behaved with statuesque propriety and silence at the family table.

Is there not a golden mean? Are not children human beings? With certain limitations, may they not share in the family talk? Ought not this talk to prove an important part of their education? Says dear Robert Louis Stevenson, summing up the matter:

> A child should always say what's true
> And speak when he is spoken to,
> And behave mannerly at table.
> At least, so far as he is able."

Sunny Views for Other People

OVER and over again we are all told to act upon the excellent advice of Sydney Smith, and "look about us." Live in the sunshine, enjoy the good, be bright, be hopeful, be courageous, do your share to make the good conquer the wrong, until more of us are impressed with the importance of cultivating the sunshine. Let us go a step further and take sunny views of other people.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Student, Scranton, Pa. What were the Alabama claims often referred to as having initiated the practice of International Arbitration?

They arose out of the war. The Confederate cruiser Alabama was fitted out in England, and in spite of the warnings given by our minister to the British Government, that she was intended to prey on the marine of a Power with which that Government was at peace, the Alabama was permitted to sail from a British port. Our Government contended that this was a violation of International law. The question was submitted to a court of arbitration, composed of judges nominated by Italy, Switzerland and Brazil. Great Britain, under its sentence, paid damages amounting to nearly $16,000,000.

New Reader, Bloomfield, N. J. 1. What is sin? 2. Should we know that sin had entered the world if we had no Bible? If so, how? 3. Would the human family be happy, contented and prosperous, were it not for sin? 4. When, where and by whom is the word devil first mentioned in the Bible?

1. It is moral depravity or wickedness. Specifically a transgression of the divine command, either by disobedience or by omitting to fulfil the divine command. This may be in thought or word, and differs from crime in that it may not violate human law. 2. Not definitely, though there would be a consciousness of certain actions and words being wrong. The conscience in proportion to its enlightenment would reproach us, and we should see in the conduct of others the evidence of sin (see Romans 1:20; 2:15). The Apostle says that where there is no law there is yet a law written in the heart. 3. If there were no sin the chief cause of unhappiness would be removed, but even then there might be occasion for sorrow in the events of life. 4. The word "devil" does not occur in the Old Testament. Its first use is in Matt. 4:1, "Then was Jesus led up into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil." There is, however, no doubt that he is referred to in Gen. 3:1 under the figure of the serpent, and elsewhere under other figures, and by other names as in Job 1:6, where he is called Satan.

John Blocher, of Franklin Grove, Ill. writes:

B. C. Unseld, New York:—I am now, and for many years have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and having been for many years a teacher of vocal music and choir leader, I have been much interested in your series of music lessons. I took my first lessons in vocal music fifty-five years ago. I was then a youth of fifteen. Our teacher was one of Lowell Mason's pupils, and in following your lessons thus far, I observe that you are giving your pupils about the same instructions I received fifty-five years ago. In those days, there were very few country churches in which there was an organ to lead the choir, as in the present age. Then persons who could not sing their parts at sight were not admitted into the choir. I note your illustration of a metronome in lesson No. 5, and am pleased to know that I have one person at least on my side, who believes in teaching pupils to keep regular time by practising with a metronome.

G. M. P., Ontario. Does the warning against the unpardonable sin (Mark 3:29, 30) apply to the thoughts and impulses, and the suggestions of Satan?

No, it would be a serious matter with many people if it did. The mind has often a morbid tendency to dwell on prohibitions until, by a singular perversity there is an impulse to do the very thing prohibited. That impulse is best overcome by some active service that will put an end to the morbid brooding. Try to do some work for another, or any good work that needs to be done. Your letter shows that you cannot have committed the unpardonable sin. If you had, you would probably be in no distress of mind, but would be indifferent. The wicked, malignant, and deliberate charge to which our Lord referred was a very different thing from the momentary impulse that you experienced. Ask God's forgiveness, which he will assuredly give, cease brooding, and by all means get to work.

C. R. J., Butte City, Mont. What is the meaning of the words prefixed to the first and every ninth verse of the 119th Psalm?

They are the letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Each passage is an acrostic in the original. The lines begin with the letter at the head of the passage.

C. E. K., Milwaukee, Wis., and many others. Does the soul of the departing Christian go straight to heaven, or does it remain with the body in the grave, until the resurrection?

In the absence of explicit statements in the Bible on the subject, we have to fall back on inferences, and, as it appears to us, all the inferences point to conscious existence after death and not to a sleep in the grave. Whether there is at first a full enjoyment of the glories of heaven, or whether there is an intermediate state in which the soul is gradually prepared in circumstances of felicity to enter the divine presence, has often been debated, without result. In The Parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16:19-31), Jesus represents both the rich man and Lazarus as being alive and conscious, while the rich man's brothers were still living on the earth. Christ's promise to the thief (Luke 23:43) would have been meaningless, if he had promised him merely sleep in death. Paul evidently did not expect to sleep till the resurrection. He said (Phil. 1:23) that he desired to depart and be with Christ, which was far better. A man so active in service as he, would have had no desire to depart, if departing was merely going into unconsciousness. These and other passages, give ground for the belief that the soul of the Christian at death, enters into the joy of the Lord.

Reader, Milford, Pa. 1. In last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I saw a picture of a wee tenement maid. She looked a little untidy. Would it not be a good idea for your people to teach these young ones to keep their clothes in good order, and to make a good appearance before others? 2. Why do the Chinese wear such large, clumsy hats?

1. The tenement child in the picture is a type of thousands of others. That is how they are—at least, how many are—when we get them to Mont-Lawn; but there they are taught tidiness, and if their clothing be torn, it is mended neatly or replaced by something better. 2. Immemorial custom, we suppose.

L. I. B., Hemlock, Mich. 1. Are there not many passages in the Bible, such as Ex. 21:21, which endorse slavery? 2. Do not passages such as Prov. 31:6 sanction the drinking of wine? Why then do temperance advocates say that abstinence is a Christian's duty? 3. Do not the theories of how the world came into existence show the account in Genesis to be absurd?

1. The laws given by Moses to his people were not intended to be obligatory for all time. There were many things permitted to them, as Christ pointed out, which were not meant to be permanent (see Matt. 19:8). Slavery was one of these. 2. The sanction you mention is very qualified. If only those drank who were ready to perish, the custom would soon decrease. The evil of drinking has so greatly increased, and does so much mischief in our time, that Christians are bound by Bible principles to abstain as an example and encouragement to others. 3. They are mere theories, which have been changed repeatedly. They do not disprove the Bible statement, which is in no sense scientific. It may be that the writer intended simply to present a series of tableaux showing the various stages of preparation of the earth for human habitation, the first being long subsequent to the nebular stage to which you refer.

B. W. B. Willow Brook, Va. I would be glad to hear your opinion regarding a minister of the Gospel who practices hypnotism and fortune-telling.

We would regret to hear of a preacher of the Gospel who seriously took up such practices. We are disposed, however, to think there may be some mistake, and that some stray remark or incident may have resulted in misjudging the motive. It would be absurd, of course, for any preacher to expect his people to tolerate practices that are now the mainstay and source of revenue of a certain class of charlatans.

E. S. F., Portland Heights, Oreg. 1. Why did the Jews fear, as appears (John 11:48), that the Romans would take away their place and nation? Had not the Romans already done that? 2. What parts of the Passover ceremony are still observed by the Jews?

1. The Romans ruled the nation, but the nation was still there. The Jews dreaded the catastrophe which befel them about forty years later, when Jerusalem was taken by assault, and the temple burned, and the people scattered by Roman armies. Then the Romans did take away place and nation, and so it has been to this day. 2. There is the search for leaven, the solemn Passover repast eaten with herbs and unleavened bread; the lamb is represented by a part of a lamb, and the prescribed questions are asked by a son or daughter and are answered, as directed, by the father.

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. S. L. R., Jacksonville, Fla. You probably mean the poet of Vallambrosa.

J. F., Galesburg, Ill. We never discuss politics, but will say that if a man will vote as he prays—for the best—he cannot vote amiss. A vote deliberately thrown away when it might be used to good purpose in supporting a good man, is a vote wasted.

Reader, Kinsman, O. The question implies the existence of a personal grievance against the person referred to. There is a possibility you may be mistaken. What was said may have been said in error, or through misunderstanding, or may have been misinterpreted by yourself. Don't nurse your grievance. We advise you to go to the other person and frankly state what you have in your heart and ask him to do his part to set the matter right. This we conceive to be the simple Christian duty under the circumstances.

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON VII.

Divided Pulses.—The exercises thus far studied have contained no tones shorter an whole pulses, no notes faster than quarter notes. We are now to study exercises with two and four tones to a pulse, to divide the time of a pulse into half pulses d quarter pulses.

Illustration.—Set your metronome swinging, rather slowly (about thirty inches length of string should have been mentioned in Lesson V. that the longer the string the slower the movement), begin tapping and singing, one tone and one tap to each swing, singing the word "tap." Presently change the word "tap" into "tap ping," pronouncing the two syllables in equal time (one to each swing and tap. In doing this you will be singing two tones to the pulse, dividing the pulse into halves. Begin again with single pulses to "tap," then change to half-pulses with "tapping" and presently change to "tap a lap pa," the four syllables to be sung in equal time to each swing and tap. In doing this you will be singing four tones to the pulse, dividing the pulse into quarter pulses. Next try the illustration over, singing, "taa" to whole pulses, "taa-tai" to half pulses, and "ta fa te fe" to quarter pulses. Then again, singing "la" for a single tone to a swing, "la-la" for two tones and "la-la-la-la" for four tones to a swing or tap. Several repetitions of each will may be needed.

14.—With the quarter note, as the pulse note, whole pulse tones are represented by quarter notes, half pulse tones (two tones to a pulse), are represented by eighth notes, and quarter pulse tones (four tones to a pulse), by sixteenth notes.

If necessary, get a musical friend to play or sing the following exercises for you, and then try them yourself without help. Sing them, first to the time-names "taa," "taa-tai," etc., and then to la.

Ex. 35. Eighth notes (♪♪) represent two tones to a pulse.

Taa taa Taa tai taa Taa tai taa - tai Taa taa Taa taa tai Taa aa.

Ex. 36. Sixteenth notes (♬) represent four tones to a pulse.

Taa taa Taa tai taa Taa tai te - fa te - fe Taa tai taa.

Dotted Notes.—It was taught in a previous lesson that the addition of a dot creases the value of a note one-half. A dotted half note is equal to a half and quarter note tied; it represents a tone three pulses long. A dotted quarter note uals the value of a quarter and an eigth note tied; it represents a tone a pulse and half long. A dotted eighth equals the value of an eighth and sixteenth tied; it presents a tone three-quarters of a pulse in length.

The next following exercises are to be studied in the same way the preceding es were. Get help, if necessary.

Ex. 37. The dotted quarter note (♩.) represents a tone a pulse and a half long.

Taa taa tai Taa - a tai Taa-a tai Taa taa Taa tai taa tai Taa-aa.

Ex. 38. The dotted eight (♪.) represents a tone of three quarter pulse length.

Taa tai taa te - fe Taa tai taa - e - fe Taa tai taa - efe Taa tai taa.

Rests.—A pulse, a part of a pulse, or several pulses may be passed in silence.

Illustration.—With your metronome swinging, begin tapping and singing in two-pulse measure, ging Taa taa, Taa taa, etc. Presently begin whispering the second taa of every two; then sing it mentally, merely think it. This will illustrate silences of one pulse. Begin again, singing on each pulse; esently drop out every other group of two, thus, Taa taa, (taa taa), etc. This will illustrate silences two pulses.

15.—Silences in music are called Rests. The characters that indicate silences e also called rests. Rests correspond in value with the notes from which they are med, each note having a rest representing the same time-length.

	Whole.	Half.	Quarter.	Eighth.	Sixteenth.
NOTES,	𝅝	𝅗𝅥	♩	♪	𝅘𝅥𝅯
RESTS.	𝄻	𝄼	𝄽	𝄾	𝄿

Practice the next two exercises with the aid of the metronome or tapping. Each ercise to be repeated several times. At first speak the word "rest"; then whisper and then think it.

Ex. 39. The quarter rest (𝄽) represents a silence of one pulse.

Taa taa Taa (rest) etc.

Ex. 40. The half rest (𝄼) represents a silence of two pulses.

Taa taa (rest rest) (rest rest)

Your singing-school book and the Sunday School and church tune-books will rnish you an abundance of music for the practice of the items presented in this sson. It is the privilege of any of our readers to ask questions on the lessons, or send written lessons for examination. Address the writer, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Called Higher

Mrs. Elizabeth Early, an aged Christian and longe reader of this paper, passed away lately at the me of her daughter, Mrs. Mary E. Miller, in iladelphia. She had been an invalid for a numof years and was a great Bible reader. By her ole life, she set a beautiful Christian example to se around her.

Seldom is it given a servant of the Lord to pass mediately from service into glory, but such was experience of Rev. Dr. Cary Heslett Hansford nnell, a retired clergyman of the Congregational urch. Just after concluding a sermon from the st. Isaiah 7:4, "Take heed and be quiet," in the esbyterian Church, Chester, N. J., on Sunday rning, Sept. 6th, Dr. Pannell passed away in the pit, without a struggle. For a number of years had suffered from valvular heart trouble, and out four years ago was obliged to give up active storal labor, and had since resided in Flanders. was born in Virginia in 1833, and his widow, Miss Caroline Robinson Bladen of Philadelphia, also of a Virginia family, and three children—Rev. William Tillott Pannell, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Flanders, N. J., Mrs. George Ellery Vanderbilt, New York City, and Miss Julia B. Pannell, Flanders, survive him. In 1864 he became a member of the National Telegraphic Union, N. Y., and was associated with Morse and others in the successful reading telegraphy by sound. He had been connected with many of the foremost periodicals of the day, both as editor and contributor, and had written many poems and songs, also a

Kishineff, After the Massacre

A BRESLAU journal publishes a letter from an American lady, Mrs. Richard Henry Savage, who has been to Kishineff on a visit to her daughter, who is married to the local Marshal of Nobility. The letter says that twenty-seven of the rioters have been condemned to terms of penal servitude ranging from two months to a year, and that forty-five are still awaiting their trial.

Mrs. Savage's daughter hid about forty fugitive Jews in the cellars of her residence, but the servants begged that the Jews might be turned adrift lest the mob should attack the house. No one in Kishineff doubts that the massacre was authorized. The massacre could easily have been prevented; one officer with three soldiers kept from thirty to forty rioters back. The general opinion in Kishineff is that the Government hopes by encouraging persecution of the Jews to divert the attention of the people from Nihilism and Socialism.

The report of the massacre sent to the Foreign Office by Mr. Bosanquet, the British Vice-Consul at Odessa, leads to the same conclusion, that the authorities were responsible for the massacres. The outrages ceased as soon as the Governor abandoned the passive attitude which he had assumed from the beginning. The continued toleration of articles in the local papers, which plainly incited the people of Kishineff to outrage upon the Jews, amounted to positive encouragement to violence. Neither the press censor, nor the editors of the local journals, appear to have been censured in any way for the events which ensued.

Damaged Red-Letter Testaments

In a great establishment like that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD books will get damaged. We handle 300,000 a year—sometimes a nail in the packing-box will damage books—some get shelf-worn, some are damaged by the mice, others again are carelessly handled and the backs are broken. Of our Red Letter New Testaments we have quite a stock with damaged covers—some more so, others less—but every one to some extent. To have them re-covered makes a poor job, and hence we now offer them at the ridiculously low price of 25 cents each, guaranteeing the integrity of the contents, but not of the covers. These Testaments are bound the same as our $1.50 stock, but are not perfect. We also guarantee to refund your money if you are not satisfied, on return of the books. It goes without saying that the demand for Red Letter New Testaments with their pages perfect, at 25 cents, charges prepaid, will be simply enormous, and that means that if you want any you must act quickly. In lots of twelve we will sell them at $2.50: singly at 25 cents each.

If you really want any do not delay. Now is the time. Address, CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Department, Bible House, New York.

Chinese Converts Baptized

Writing from Wuhu, China, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Missionary Z. C. Beals says:

Please accept my hearty thanks for the $10 just received from you. I will use this in the new district to spread the Gospel among those who have never heard it. I have just returned from Chao Hsien, the centre of this district. While there I baptized eleven persons—nine men and two women—in the Chao lake. To the outside natives it was a strange sight, indeed, as no one had ever been baptized in the lake before. This church, you will remember, was opened after the great flood a year and a half ago, but since then I have baptized there fifty-three people.

Found Christ in the Bowery Mission

A Memorable Service at the Old Mission — The Touching Story of the Conversion of J. E. Barrett

A MOST impressive service was held in the Bowery Mission, on a recent Sunday morning, in memory of one of the converts, Jabez Irwin Barrett, of London, England. The pathetic circumstances surrounding his departure from a life of struggle and suffering were well known on the Bowery, and a large crowd attended. A simple pillow of immortelles hung from the front of the organ bearing the inscription, "In Memoriam. J. E. B." The hymns sung were those own to be favorites of the departed mrade, who was a musician of considera- skill, and who occasionally officiated as sistant organist. A solemn hush rested on the assembly, and many of the men re moved to tears. It was a sad and uching story that came out of the many ving testimonies, but brightened by the owledge that this prodigal—one of many ousands reclaimed through the instru- entality of this Mission—was now enjoy- g eternal freedom from sin, and safety m suffering in his Heavenly Father's me.

On May 11, 1902, Mr. Barrett yielded mself up to God in the Mission. He was reserved disposition, and seldom spoke iblicly, but lived a quietly useful life. r several months he stayed in the emorial House, and his love for Mr. rd, the Superintendent, and his associ- es there, was intense. In the spring of is year he found a position which neces- ated his leaving that home, and he was not seen in the Mission again. In June, the Superintendent of the Mission, Mr. Hallimond, on the day preceding his departure for England, received news that Mr. Barrett was lying in a hospital in Brooklyn, incurably consumptive. Mr. Hallimond hurried over the river, but the wrong address had been given, and he had to leave the country without seeing the dear, suffering boy. On arriving in London, Mr. Hallimond called immediately on the parents and acquainted them of the perilous condition of their son—their only child. At once arrangements were made for sending him home. A relative living in this country undertook to accompany him across the ocean. Meanwhile, fervent prayers ascended from the Bowery Mission that his life might be spared until he had seen his parents. The prayer was answered.

No sooner had the vessel swung up to the landing-stage at Liverpool, than the agonized father rushed up the gang-way and down into the state-room where they were preparing to carry the boy ashore. No words were spoken, except perhaps a gasping murmur from the father's trembling lips, "My poor boy!" There was an upward wistful look from the dying son's eyes; "a light never seen on land or sea" shone there, telling of an everlasting content and peace, that no sin or sorrow would disturb, and the soul had passed away.

At the Memorial Service, a letter was read from Mrs. Bird, telling of a visit she had paid Mr. Barrett in the hospital. "Almost the last words he said to me," wrote Mrs. Bird, "were, 'Tell Mr. Hallimond that I know my sins are all forgiven, and I am all ready to go. Tell him I owe it all to the Bowery Mission.'"

Some of the testimonies were very touching. One of his friends in the Memorial House, a doctor, told of Barrett's asking him on one occasion to make an examination of his lungs, and how, when the truth of his precarious state was revealed to him, he made the doctor promise not to tell any one, "especially his parents."

Mr. Card, the Superintendent of the Memorial Home, told of the utterly discouraged condition Barrett was in when he entered the Home, and what a great grief it was to him to realize how sadly he had disappointed his parents.

One after another, men rose to testify of some kindness they had received from this quiet and unostentatious man. One poor, sickly fellow, with a gaunt face and hollow cough, announced himself as a victim of the same fell disease that had carried off Mr. Barrett, and hearing of the service to be held, he had come for the purpose of relating how, just before going into the hospital, Barrett had secured for him the position he himself was leaving. "When I saw him last," the poor fellow said, "he shook me by the hand, and said, 'Good-bye, I'll never be able to work again, but I know I'm all right.'"

Mr. Hunt, one of the converts, rising to sing one of Mr. Barrett's solos, said, "Many a time, at his request, I've sung this hymn to him, when he would sob and cry like a child." No wonder. With a venomous disease gnawing at his heart, nervous and reticent by nature, shrinking from human society, and consequently much misunderstood, what wonder that his soul was stirred by the words his comrade sung.

He knows, He knows,
The storms that would my way oppose,
He knows, He knows,
And tempers every wind that blows.

After this, every one felt the sweet force of the extract from one of his letters that the Superintendent read.

"Although I am not often present at the meetings, and have but little to say, I am trying to live the life begun in the Mission on May 11th, 1902, and am not ashamed to be a Bowery Mission Convert."

Very touching indeed have been the letters received from the parents. The father has written the Superintendent: "How kind of you all to take up our burden, and what inexpressible comfort it brings to us to know that our dear boy was solaced by such love and sympathy. But for the knowledge of this, our broken hearts would be crushed."

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

"BUT do you know any temperance story that isn't harrowing?" asked Mr. Vernon. "In the nature of the case, anything the saloon has to do with is harrowing."

"But the saloon isn't in evidence yet, I suppose Douglas will see to that all right. Esther, I say you did finely. Your chapter is all right. But it most made me lose my appetite. How's yours, George?"

He needn't have asked, for George was giving account of two apple pies and the larger part of a yellow-legged chicken.

"It takes more than that to spoil my appetite, Mr. Edwards."

"I believe you, George. Fox's book of Martyrs wouldn't faze you any."

After lunch the audience, increased in numbers by some late arrivals, began to fill up the seats again. The theme of conversation was evidently the outcome of the story. When, after the singing and recitations, Mr. Sage announced, "Chapter two of the Temperance Story will be read by Mr. Frank Douglas, editor of the Colby Beacon," the vast crowd leaned forward, and there was a hush of expectancy on the part of every listener.

Douglas had risen and taken one step towards the front of the platform, when a sudden commotion began at his left, where the crowd had edged up so close to the platform that the young men were sitting on it with their feet dangling over.

A man struggled through the crowd, and getting up to the platform beckoned to Mr. Sage. He went over and leaned down to hear. Douglas waited. People began to stand up. A buzz of questions went over the audience.

Suddenly Mr. Sage stood straight up and exclaimed, "Jake Lawson is selling beer to the boys down on the creek. This is my farm, and Jake Lawson nor no other man is going to sell beer on my farm at this picnic if I know it. Stay right where you are. I don't need no help more than I've got. I'll be back in a few minutes. Let the children sing something. Don't read until I come back."

He jumped down from the platform and the crowd opened to let him through.

"Let's all go!" some one shouted.

"No!" Mr. Sage's voice rose like a wind storm. "Stay where you be! I can settle this alone!"

The crowd sat down again as the children began to sing.

Five minutes went by, and the chorus had started another piece, when suddenly there rang out, sharp and clear, two gunshots one quickly after another. The entire audience of over 4,000 people as one person rose to their feet, and in the tension of the momentary silence that followed another shot rang out.

CHAPTER VII

THE next five minutes in Sage's grove witnessed a scene that was not down on the programme, but it was the most thrilling of all the events of the day, as things "not on the programme" are very apt to be. Several hundred of the audience broke over the seats and rushed in an excited mob through the woods toward the sound of the gun-shots. The creek bank, which formed the natural amphitheatre on which Mr. Sage had placed his seats, rose up to a bare knoll of land which commanded a wide and unobstructed view of the farm in all directions, and before they knew just how they came to be impelled in that direction, Douglas, Mr. Edwards, Mr. Vernon, George, Quits, and a large crowd were climbing up to the top of the knoll. Some boy who had been sitting up in a tree before the shots were heard had yelled, "He's after him in a buggy! There they go!" pointing in the direction beyond the top of the knoll. The crowd had turned, and in the excitement the Colby party were swept up to the ridge of the bank with the rest.

Once there, the sight that met their eyes was, as George exclaimed, "worth more than a circus."

Across the prairie in full chase, Farmer Sage, in a buggy which he had pressed into service from a number down by the creek, was urging at the top of his speed an old white horse, and only a few rods in front Jake Lawson, of Jake's place in Colby, was lashing furiously a big black horse attached to a light wagon, in the rear of which the excited spectators could see several beer kegs bobbing about.

"It's white against black," Mr. Vernon remarked grimly.

"He's gaining on him! He's gaining!" Mr. Edwards exclaimed, in his excitement crushing Mrs. Edwards' hat into a shapeless mass between his hands. As the party had swept up the knoll, Mrs. Edwards' hat had fallen off and Mr. Edwards had picked it up. "It will get stepped on if you don't," he said when his wife told him not to stop for it.

"I don't believe he can catch him!" cried Douglas. "Ah!" the cry burst from a thousand people as they saw the saloonkeeper turn and deliberately aim a gun at his pursuer. There was a puff of smoke and a report rang over the prairie. Farmer Sage simply hit the old white horse with his lines (he had lost his whip at the start), and leaned forward a little more. His old felt hat fell off and dropped behind the buggy.

"He didn't hit anything!" said George, dancing up and down. "I wish I was inside that old plug of a horse. I'd make him move as if he had swallowed a barrel of red pepper!"

For the next half mile the race was nip and tuck. Pursuer and pursued were on the section road now, and there was no turning out. But at the end of a half mile Jake Lawson pulled his horse quickly over into a wide stretch of unfenced prairie, and lashing the animal into a gallop, started down a long swale, and for a few moments he was lost to view. Sage followed only a short distance behind, and he also disappeared from the sight of the crowd on the knoll.

Suddenly Lawson appeared on top of a swell of the prairie, still whipping his horse, and going at a hard gait. As he passed over the crest of the rise, the spectators saw one of the beer kegs bounce up into the air and out of the rear of the wagon. It struck the ground and began to roll down the swell. Farmer Sage appeared, but the white horse was winded, and had been reduced to a walk. The beer keg, gathering impetus as it rolled, struck the animal full on the shins, and down he went to inglorious defeat. The spectators on the knoll could see Farmer Sage jump from the buggy, and run to the head of the animal. He succeeded in getting him to his feet again, and then he picked up the beer keg and put it in the buggy, turned around, and slowly drove back. Jake Lawson was seen on top of the next rise, shaking his fist at the entire temperance picnic, before he disappeared in the direction of Colby.

The crowd rushed down the hill to meet Mr. Sage, who soon, drove up covered with dirt and perspiration but otherwise undisturbed. "I'll learn 'em to try to sell beer on my farm," he said as he lifted out the keg of beer and called for an ax. One was found in a buggy, and putting the keg down near the edge of the creek Mr. Sage smashed in the head, and the crowd cheered as the liquor ran down into the stream.

"He didn't hit you any where did he?"

"Didn't come within two inches. He fired four times. If I couldn't shoot straighter than that I wouldn't carry a gun," said Farmer Sage contemptuously.

"There's a hole in your hat," said Mr. Edwards, winking at the crowd.

"What's another hole more or less? Come on now folks. Let's get back to the performance."

"Wonder what he calls what we've just been a gettin'," muttered George, who afterwards told Quits he hadn't had so much fun at a picnic since he couldn't remember when.

The crowd slowly recovered from the excitement and went back to the seats. In one sense the interruption was not a bad thing for Douglas. He had purposely made his chapter frankly local, and the appearance of Jake Lawson on the scene gave additional interest to the story of Andrew Miner and his Mother.

Mr. Sage started the chorus and had them sing for a few minutes until the audience had gathered. Then he introduced Douglas again, saying briefly, "I don't think we'll be interrupted again." Douglas opened his chapter with the scene in the lonely farmhouse, where Esther had left it.

* * * * * *

"Is Andy dead?—Don't tell me he is dead!" She put out her thin hands in a gesture of appeal towards her neighbor.

"No,—he ain't dead—" the man answered slowly. "But he—you know Jim Walker. Jim's been at Kelsey's now for two years. His father came in yesterday and told us he heard Jim had taken to drinking. And he was goin' in company with your boy. Bud Noble saw 'em both, in at Jake's place two weeks ago, playing billiards—"

"Is that all?" Asked Rod, after a pause. His mother was sitting bent over, her hands over her face and sobbing softly.

The neighbor shuffled his feet awkwardly.

"Noble said both boys had been drinking some. I thought you ought to know. 'Taint easy to bring bad news. I wish the whole liquor business was in perdition!" The man added with an energy that was unexpected, as his dull eyes glowed with the fire of some past experience in which the drink devil had had some part. And can you name a single family anywhere that has not at some time felt through relation, friend or acquaintance, the blasting touch of this world-wide pestilence?

"It seems to me the business is there already," replied Rod with bitterness. His mother still continued her sobbing, but she was not violent. The man rose to go.

"I'm sorry, Mrs. Miner. Wish I could do something for you."

"You can't do nothing. You, nor God, nor nobody," she said in a muffled voice, without rising from her position.

The neighbor did not even say good night. He simply walked out, and Rod could hear his wagon rumble away across the prairie.

"Come, mother!" Rod spoke in a tone that sounded rough and hard. "You go to bed! It's no use to cry over Andy. He's chose his own course. Let him suffer for it. You nor I ain't to blame."

His mother raised her head. She put out her hand timidly and touched the boy on the arm.

"Rod, won't you go in town to-morrow and see Andy?"

"What good would that do?"

"But won't you, Rod? Tell him he's killing me. And he promised. Tell him about his father."

"He knows about father already."

"No, no he don't, Rod!" the mother spoke with shrill earnestness. "He thinks father was taken ill in Colby when we sent him in for the doctor. Remember, Rod, Andy was only nine years old then. Won't you go, Rod?"

"I'll go if you want me to just to please you. But I know now it won't do any good. Andy's got father's blood in him. Nothing that I can do now, nor you neither, can keep Andy from drinking."

"But may be God can," Mrs. Miner almost shrieked it.

"I doubt it," answered Rod bitterly. "I don't believe God cares. If he does, why don't he strike Jake Lawson dead?"

"Rod, you must not talk so. God is love. If he ain't love, we might as well all die and be done with it."

Rod did not answer. His moody spirit, crushed down under the stress of the lonesome life of hard toil he had known since a small child on that prairie farm, had little faith in a Power which seemed to his narrow and bitter experience to be more relentless force than Fatherly compassion. When he went to bed that night he had promised his mother again that he would go into Colby on the morrow, but he had no faith whatever that he could influence his brother or prevail on him to break the habit of drinking now that he had begun it.

Since Andrew had left home, Rod had slept downstairs next to his mother's room. This night he awoke and lay there wondering as he heard the clock in the sitting-room strike twelve. He was a sound sleeper and his waking was not natural. As he tried to sleep again, a voice in his mother's room startled him. It was deep and strong, unwavering and hard in its metallic rhythm. It set his senses at once on the alert and a fear tugged at his heart as he listened.

"O God, do you care anything for your children like me? If so, why have you made this wide lonesome prairie and made me live on it? If you love me, why have you killed my husband and my three pretty little ones? It must be cold and dark for them out there in the grove, nights. But, O God, if you really care, why don't you save my boy Andy? He is my baby, now the others are gone. I would save him if I could, but I'm not able. Won't you save him? He's young yet. Isn't he worth saving? Nobody don't care for him but me, but they ain't nursed him and cared for him after hard days' work the way I have. If you want to love anything the best way is to suffer for it. And I've suffered for that boy. I've sat up nights by his crib when I was so tired I couldn't keep awake without burning my arm with a knitting needle heated over the lamp. O God, why do you let your children suffer so? We must be pretty wicked all these years to get all this punishment. But it seems to me sometimes as if the wrong people are punished. Why don't you punish Jake Lawson some? He's making money and he seems happy. Why should my three little ones die because their father—— O God, don't let Andy go to hell! Save him from hell, O God! Send me there in his place! Only I want to see my little ones again. They are with you, hain't they. They hain't in the ground, are they? Tell me, God, they hain't in the ground. They were just beginning to play. They were such good company for me when their father and the boys were at work. And our nearest neighbor four miles away. O, God, I'm lonesome! I've no one to play with. And now you're going to send Andy to hell! And it seems only last night I heard him say:

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.

Dear Lord, if you keep track of all the prayers that's said won't you look the number of times he said that prayer, and if he goes bad now won't you credit him with his baby prayers, so much in his favor! O God save his soul, O God."

As in Andrews' case, Rod could bear no more. He threw a blanket around him and went out into the sitting room and knocked at his mother's door.

"Mother! mother! are you ill? Do you want anything?"

The voice instantly ceased, and after a moment Rod opend the door and went in.

"Are you ill, mother?"

"No," his mother spoke in her natural tone, but she was sobbing softly.

CIVIC RIGHTEOUSNESS*

The Duty of the Christian Citizen of Insisting on the Integrity and Morality of Candidates.

WHILE civilization has changed the character of our social life, and while our circumstances and relations with one another and with the State have become more complicated with the passage of centuries, the fundamental principles of government remain the same as in the earliest ages. Moses had to insist as we have to-day, on impartiality in our courts and the strict administration of justice. There is no surer indication of the decline of a nation than the corruption of its judges. When men lose confidence in the courts the disintegration of society has begun. It is so in all departments of the government. Nothing breeds discontent and lawlessness more surely and more quickly than the realization in a community that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor, or that the rights of the poor and the weak will not be protected by the government against the assaults of the rich and powerful.

At this season of the year, when the elections are approaching, this fundamental principle needs to be remembered. Our system of government affords peculiar opportunities for ignoring it. While our system is undoubtedly the best ever organized, it demands, as our political orators often tell us, constant vigilance. The political parties have debts to pay and obligations to fulfil, and they are liable to fulfil them by nominating for office men unfit for their duties. The shrewd lawyer, whose brilliant speeches have time and again helped to win victory for his party, must be compensated, and though his character may be bad, he is liable to be nominated for some responsible office, in which he has at his mercy the property and interests of his fellow-citizens. Every man feels reluctant to sever his connection with his political party. Only urgent need will induce him to do so. But when an unfit man is nominated, when a man of bad character is on the party ticket, the duty of scratching his name is imperative. It is the only way, though it is often painful. But if it is done firmly, the parties learn the lesson and take better care in future in making nominations. Already one such lesson has been taught, but it needs to be repeated in every State and city in order that it may be well learned.

A Missionary Family

THE influence of heredity has an interesting illustration in the family of the Humes, two eminent members of which have, as our readers will remember, rendered conspicuous and valuable service in administering the funds sent through this journal for the relief of the famine-sufferers in India. Rev. E. S. Hume, of Bombay, and his brother, Dr. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, are both eminent missionaries, and are not only preaching the Gospel to large numbers of the natives of India, but are at the head of institutions which are educating children and young people for Christian life among their people. It is an arduous duty, and one demanding self-sacrifice in no common degree. It involves expatriation, and absence from friends and tender associations and from all that makes life pleasant and enjoyable. None know that better than the families of the missionaries, yet the spirit that prompted the fathers to undertake the work and sustains them in it has developed in the children, so that the law of heredity, the effects of which criminologists so deeply deplore, has its beneficent side, and the church is reaping the benefit of it.

We learn from a recent letter, that the eldest son of Rev. E. S. Hume is now preparing for medical missionary work in India, and that three of Dr. R. A. Hume's family are also preparing to tread in their father's steps. His eldest son, who graduated at Yale with the degrees of Master of Arts and Doctor of Philosophy, is now in his senior year in Union Theological Seminary, preparing for missionary work. His eldest sister, Miss Ruth P. Hume, who holds the diploma of Doctor of Medicine, is to leave America next month to take charge of a Woman's Hospital at Ahmednagar. Her sister, Miss Hannah Hume, is a graduate of Wellesley, and president of her class. She is about to marry Rev. T. S. Lee, who is going to India as a missionary and will herself take active part in missionary work. We heartily congratulate the representatives of both generations, and are glad that a name so honored in missionary annals will have new life and multiplied representation in the service of Christ in future years.

Shenir, or the mountain of light. The word Shenir means a lantern or a light, and it fitly represents the higher light which comes, not merely from the Scriptures, but from the Spirit who inspired them, and who still comes to us to illumine them. Like the two silver trumpets of the wilderness, the Word and the Spirit always go together in the revelation of the will of God to his people. Let this mountain side be dedicated to the Holy Ghost, where he shall ever be recognized, honored, and welcomed. Then shall we dwell on high, and in his light look out out over all earth's darkness, and sorrow, and walk in the light of his coming, and in some little measure shall be fulfilled to us even here the glorious prophecy that yet waits a larger fulfilment. "It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established upon the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills, and people shall flow unto it. Oh, the house of Jacob, come ye and let us walk in the house of the Lord."

Hermon or the mount of Transfiguration. Midway in the Master's life, just a little before the garden and the cross, he was taken up to the heights of Hermon and thence looked out over the dark valley just before him and went down into its toils and trials in the glorious light of that hour of rapture, and that entered hope of which it is a foretaste. He needed that transfiguration to prepare him for the dark journey before him, and they needed it to prepare them for the trials which were to come to them through his death and departure. And so along life's way there are places where we need to go up into an exceeding high mountain, and by the power of his glory and the power of his coming enter into the spirit of that millennial vision. We are going out from this place to trials and testings, and we shall need the transfiguration hour. Let us enter into it and let us look from it over all the rest of the way. He is saying to some of us this morning, "Come with me from Hermon."

Oh, how little seems life's sorrow
In the light of heaven's to-morrow
While we are looking over.
Over all life's finished story,
Over to the coming glory
I am looking over.

The lions' dens and the mountains of the leopards, or the heights of victory over difficulty and trial. This is the climax of the vision to look from the place where the devil threatened to devour us and the adversary seemed for a while to triumph; but standing with God on the neck of conquered difficulties and looking over the heads of the obstacles that have obstructed our way, we can say with Samson, "Out of the eater came forth meat and out of the strong came forth sweetness," and "instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree and instead of the brier the myrtle," and our very trials shall be to the Lord for a name and to us for an everlasting sign of the all-sufficiency of his grace. God give us these mountain heights, the heights of conquered lions and captive leopards—difficulties that have turned to blessings, and stumbling stones that have become Ebenezers of praise!

We Take All the Risk

Books offered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at full CHRISTIAN HERALD prices are always bargains; but when a reduction is made to close out stock, which occasionally becomes imperative on account of lack of room, then the prices seem incredible. But our readers need not hesitate to avail themselves of any such bargains as in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office every transaction is guaranteed, and the money is always refunded without questions being asked when a customer is not pleased with his purchase. Therefore do not let the low prices quoted in this issue on books which we must dispose of, deter you from ordering. If the sum involved is only five cents, the guarantee is the same; and it is this guarantee that explains the huge proportions of our Book Department. It is pleasant to deal with a house on such generous terms, and we are happy to say, that in only very rare instances, does it occur that a customer avails himself of the privilege to return the goods.

It is gratifying to be able to state that, as far as we know, not one of our million customers has ever found occasion to complain of misrepresentation, or of delay experienced in refunding the money, whenever desired.

SIN FORGIVEN

How Christ's Suffering Atones for Sin Long Past

By Mrs. M. Baxter

OUR Lord said to the Jews (John 8: 56): "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day and he saw it, and was glad." Did not David also see the day of Christ? Paul says of him (Rom. 4: 6, R. V.): "David also pronounceth blessing upon the man unto whom God reckoneth righteousness apart from works, saying, 'Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered.'" How could David have been willing to escape the penalty of death which was his due for the sins of adultery and murder, if he had not understood how, in the sacrifice of the coming Messiah, God could "be just and the justifier of him that believeth"? He could have been no true king who would enforce the penalty of the law on others and presume on his own position as king to escape it himself. But God, who gave the sixth and seventh Commandments, had himself decided, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin; thou shalt not die" (II. Sam. 12: 13).

But how did God put it away? David, the grievous sinner, writes: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile" (Ps. 32: 1, 2). "Unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." How can it be possible that God can see sin committed, his own holy law broken, and yet fail to impute that sin to the sinner? This is the great, wondrous secret of the Gospel. On the great day of atonement, Aaron must take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin-offering. Both of them must be presented before the Lord, and then lots must be cast upon them, one for the Lord, which must be slain for a sin-offering, the blood of which must be brought within the veil, and be sprinkled before the mercyseat, and upon the mercyseat, and then upon the altar of burnt-offering to cleanse it. And then "Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions, in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited. And he shall let go the goat into the wilderness" (Lev. 16: 5-22).

But could God really transfer the actual sins of his people, which were committed against him, to this innocent animal? Scripture answers: "In those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year. For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins" (Heb. 10: 3, 4). The law was but a shadow of good things to come (Heb. 10: 1), but Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, can and does "purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God" (Heb. 9: 14). David had learned the great lesson that he was born in sin, and that in his own nature was no good thing. He must have the reality of that of which the scapegoat, on the day of atonement, was but the shadow. He believed God when he said through Nathan, "The Lord also hath put away thy sin"—not forgiven thy sin, as though to make David an exception to the law which, as king, he must enforce with others. God did not ignore his sin, and David all his life long had to suffer its consequences.

But that did not in any measure put away his sin. It was imputed, righteously and justly imputed, to another, who undertook to be responsible for it. In some way David must have understood what we are taught in Rom. 3: 4. He must have understood how, by works of laws (Rom. 3: 20, R.V., marg.), shall no flesh be justified in God's sight. How "all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," and how the only way left for guilty man is to be "justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus." The scapegoat was a picture, but only a picture of a tremendous reality. "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned everyone to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him" —whom he hath set forth to be a propitiation—"the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6).

THE DUTY OF GIVING*

A Duty Incumbent on the Christian, the Fulfilment of Which Is Rewarded

WHEN a certain minister was chided for closing a sermon on the very highest and most spiritual aspect of the Gospel, with a pressing appeal for money, he justified himself by the Apostolic example. "Paul," he said, "after that magnificent chapter on the resurrection [I. Cor. 15], which has in all subsequent generations been the comfort of the bereaved, proceeds without any apology to say: 'Now, concerning the collection.' I therefore consider that I was authorized to make my plea on the same subject." It does seem to be incongruous sometimes to hear such pleas from the pulpit, when our thoughts have been lifted above mundane concerns by spiritual teaching. The note of appeal jars on our sensibilities, and we are brought down from the higher atmosphere to the earth with a shock. But the appeal is necessary, and the spiritual and the practical are really in close connection. Money is necessary for the Lord's work, and it ought to come more freely and liberally from those who have enjoyed the privilege of high spiritual communion.

The Apostle enjoined giving as a duty. Those who have the Gospel and are indebted to it for their greatest happiness, ought to furnish the means of sending it to others. "How much owest thou unto my Lord?" is a question the minister has a right to put to every member of his flock. Some owe to him deliverance from a sinful life, from degradation, from sorrow and shame. How much do such owe? All Christians owe him their cheer in trial, their comfort in bereavement, and their hope of heaven. How much is all that worth? We cannot show our gratitude to him personally, as could those who entertained him while on earth; but he has left us representatives of himself, and has explicitly told us that every service rendered to them will be counted by him as services rendered to himself. We, therefore, acknowledge our indebtedness and know how it can be liquidated.

But the Apostle does not leave the appeal on the basis of duty alone. He promises reward. The promise is abundantly fulfilled. It is a well-known fact which anyone can verify by surveying the list of his own friends, that those who give most freely and generously are those who prosper most. God sees that they can be trusted with wealth, and he gives it to them. The liberal soul in our day, as in those early times, is made fat. He who gives freely and cheerfully is blessed in his own soul, he is a blessing to others, and God honors him by increasing his power and means of giving.

A Bowery Salvation Crusade

The Salvation Army recently inaugurated a "Red Crusade" against sin and vice on the Bowery of New York. On the first Sunday afternoon after the crusade began, a Bowery theatre was densely packed with a miscellaneous crowd, and Commander Booth Tucker delivered a characteristic address on "The sailless, mastless, steamless yacht that won the race," which was a vivid picture of the Ark and Noah's faith in preparing it at God's command. Eighteen persons confessed Christ at the close of the service.

These Bibles are new, without a blemish, and cannot be duplicated elsewhere at twice the price we ask. They are very handsomely bound in American levant, Divinity circuit, red under gold edges, and have all the helps and maps.

The regular price is $2, but to facilitate a quick sale, we offer them, delivered free, at the extremely low price of One Dollar.

No more desirable Christmas present can be imagined than a Minion Teachers' Bible, and within two months from date purchasers will be glad to pay full price. The stock is small, and you must decide at once if you wish to share in this great bargain sale. Address to-day, CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Department, Bible House, New York.

Health, Strength, Culture

A Clear Skin and a Good Figure are More to be desired than a Pretty Face

I WISH I could put sufficient emphasis into these words to induce every woman who sees this advertisement to at least write me. After twelve years of personal experience in teaching physical culture, and a little over one year of teaching by mail, I can truthfully say that I have had as good results from mail instructions as from personal work; my mail pupil learns self-reliance and thus gets a mental as well as a physical response.

My work is not merely physical exercise. We women do not want large muscle—we want perfect strength of every vital organ of the body and that vibrant life, born of a healthful spirit, which Emerson calls "The ecstasy of life," as well as symmetrical outlines, perfect proportions, and an easy, graceful, dignified bearing which bespeaks culture and refinement.

The knowledge of the help that my pupils have received, as shown by their daily letters, is a perfect delight to me. I have never trusted a pupil to an assistant, and it is to this personal attention that I attribute my success. It takes a woman to understand a woman.

If your vitality is at a low ebb, if you are troubled with any of the so-called chronic ailments—if you are nervous, sleepless, or your system is not eliminating all impurities; if your circulation is at a low ebb; if you need to learn to breathe; if you are overly large and wish to be reduced (and increase your vitality in reducing); if you are thin and want to put on flesh—you can do so by no better means than a course in scientific culture. The experience of hundreds of my pupils would bear me out in this.

My pupils speak more definitely and more strongly for my work than I can myself. I receive extracts like the following daily:

"I weigh 40¼ lbs. less, and I cannot begin to tell you how much stronger I am."
"The quivering, fluttering sensation in my heart is gone and the neuralgia greatly decreased."
"My kidneys are much better."
"I wish that women would wake up and see what can be done for them."
"This week I have not been troubled with biliousness. I am beginning to think that the age of miracles has not passed."
"My stomach does not trouble me at all now; I can eat anything."
"My entire body feels so comfortable after all these years of utter weakness."
"Just think of it! to be relieved from constipation! Entirely free after having it for thirty years."
"You have benefited me greatly, noticeably in the straightening of the lateral curvature in my spine."
"The rheumatism has disappeared and I sleep such a restful sleep."
"I have grown from a nervous wreck into a state of good, quiet nerves."
"My mind is much clearer and my memory is much better."
"I feel so well and my color is so good."
"My eyes are stronger and I have taken off my glasses."
"The pain in the top and back of my head is entirely gone, and just think that it had been there almost all the time for three years."
"My weight has increased thirty pounds."
"My bust has increased 2 inches in the past three months."
"I am delighted with the effect of the exercises upon my catarrh."
"I have tried your treatment for colds a couple of times and find it works like a charm."
"My circulation is good and I sleep well."
"The improvement in my figure is very gratifying to me."
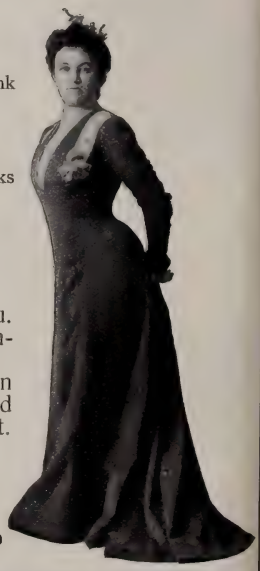
"I can never thank you enough for opening a higher aim of life for me."
"I now feel cheerful, happy, and so refreshed every morning."



If you will tell me your difficulties, I will tell you frankly whether I can help you. I have no wish to take pupils whom I cannot help. Were it not that pupils are finishing their courses daily, I could take no new ones.

If you wish, I will furnish you with names and addresses of women who have been helped and who have given me permission to use their names. For ten cents I will send you a little booklet, showing you the correct outlines of the body in poise and movement.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Many additional letters to "Donor" have been received. These have been forwarded, and will, doubtless, be read with interest. We desire to thank the very large number of friends who have expressed in these letters on this subject, the kindest thoughts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its work.

I. H. P., Troy, N. Y. In THE MAIL BAG for September 23 the question is asked: "Is a person ever justified in telling a falsehood?" The answer is in the negative, I have the impression that you may be mistaken. I would call your attention to two instances, viz.: 1. A spy in time of war endeavoring to find out the strength and plans of the enemy. 2. A detective endeavoring to ferret out crime and arrest criminals.

The purport of the above letter is, that in certain circumstances, which may arise in anyone's experience, falsehood or dissimulation or deception, is justifiable, and indispensable to success. We do not believe this to be true. Success in the worldly sense is often failure, when judged by spiritual standards. If we are living and moving on a high spiritual plane, falsehood will be intolerable and wholly needless. Our aims and purposes will then be pure and good, and it is clearly illogical to suppose that to obtain good results it could ever be necessary to resort to evil. God is truth, and we should all strive and pray to be like him in whom there is no falsehood or shadow of turning (see Col. 3:9; Titus 1:2; Rev. 21:8, and many similar passages).

Subscriber, Philadelphia, Pa. If a man and woman truly love each other, and if enemies, through envy and jealousy, defame the man's character, should not such an attack make them more persistent and true to each other?

If the attack be, as you say, groundless and merely malicious, yes; lest, however, it should have some foundation, it might be wise to investigate.

I. C., Earlville, Ia. What were the gains in membership last year in this country in the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational bodies?

The Presbyterians added 30,000 to their membership in the United States. This includes Northern, Southern and Reformed. The Methodist Episcopal gain in the United States was 35,384, and in the world about 50,000. The total gains in the United States of the whole Methodist family of seventeen branches, including African, Primitive, Wesleyan, etc., was 98,184. The Baptists thirteen branches, 48,654. The Congregationalists gained 13,330. The Methodists are at the head of the Protestant denominations in this country in point of numbers, with 6,084,755 communicants. The Baptists come next with 4,629,487.

Mrs. L. McC., Ethel, La. Will you kindly inform me what is the object of the Mormons traveling by foot all over the universe?

It is their method of making propaganda and of winning new adherents to their church and creed. The Mormon church sends out many hundreds of its emissaries for this purpose every year.

Reader, Oakville, Ont., Can. 1. What parts of the world have not as yet been entered by Christian missionaries? 2. In what parts are missionaries most needed? 3. What kind—preachers or physicians?

1. Tibet, and probably some remote parts of Africa, are about the only large unevangelized territories. 2. In the parts named, also in China, Korea, Japan and Central Asia. 3. Both preachers and medical missionaries. The latter find easier entrance.

Citizen, St. Paul, Minn. How many immigrants have reached our shores within the last twelve months? What nationalities preponderate?

In the year ending June, 1903, there were 921,315 arrivals, or 275,000 more than in the preceding year. Italy sent nearly one-fourth, or 230,000: Austro-Hungary, 206,000, and Russia, 136,000.

A. L. S., Fayetteville, Tenn. Is one who is a professing Christian, justified in hauling or selling to distillery, apples to be made into intoxicating drinks, when there is no other market for the fruit that is shed from the trees before gathering season?

We take the broad view that the whole liquor traffic is vile, uncivilized, degrading, crime-producing, and totally unfit for any respectable law-abiding person to be connected with, however remotely. A conscientious Christian would no more devote his orchard to the traffic than he would devote his wheat or corn or his bank account.

H. B. A., Hempstead, N. Y. Where can I find the quotation, "The land where it is always afternoon?"

You will find it in Tennyson's poem, "The Lotos-Eaters."

Here is a bright and novel suggestion from Mrs. L. G. H., Shingle House, Pa.:

How would your readers like to form a "Penny-a-day Missionary Club?" I began, on my last birthday, to save one cent each day to give directly to missionary work, and more when I had any special calls. That would be $3.65 per year at least, which is more than many people give annually, because they have no established rule. I believe many Sunday School children would join the club. They could often save a penny a day from the confectionery store.

Chaplain Munro, of the New York City Prison, desires us to acknowledge receipt of $2 from a Christian lady of California toward the purchase of an organ for services in Ludlow street jail. The organ will cost about $30. Any help from other readers will be gratefully appreciated.

J. M., Nashville. How did the flood of October 8, 9, in the Eastern States, compare with our Mississippi river floods? Give us the figures.

During the great rain-storm of October 8, the total rainfall in New York City was 10.04 inches, equal to a weight (estimated) of 240,595,668 tons. All railroads within a radius of 100 miles were blocked by washouts, and business in the cities was partially suspended. Much property was destroyed, and at least eight persons are known to have perished. There is no basis for comparison with the Mississippi floods, which affect a far more widely extended territory with a comparatively sparse population.

In the matter of Sunday School attendance, the record of J. A. Medoger, Jacobs Creek, Pa., is a unique one:

I have gone to Sunday School 456 Sundays without missing a Sunday, and have walked over 2,150 miles. I went 350 Sundays that I had to walk nearly five miles, and 106 four and a-half miles, and I expect to continue. If God favors me in the future as he has in the past, I expect to double the number without a break. I have also read the Bible over 3,000 days and only missed one day, and expect to read it every day as long as I live. I have given away quite a sum in presents, but I believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its premiums is the best I ever gave to any one for a present. I have some valuable CHRISTIAN HERALD presents and expect to add another one this winter

A PASTOR SUPERINTENDING THE BUILDING OF HIS OWN CHURCH

Not many pastors would have spent their summer vacation as the Rev. R. H Fife, of Kansas City, Mo., did this year. Pastor Fife is the spiritual shepherd of the Westport Church, in the residential part of the city. As the slow progress made on the new church building did not satisfy Mr. Fife, he decided to supervise the work personally. Accordingly he donned overalls, and, trowel in hand, took active part in the work for several months. It is said that nearly every stone in the edifice was either placed in position by the pastor's own hands or under his order. He worked as hard as any of the craftsmen about him, and his two sons were among his active helpers. Our photograph shows the pastor (X) standing, trowel in hand on the roof of his new church.

May God ever bless the Editor, Dr. Klopsch, for what he has done for our nation, by giving us such a paper as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Rev. M. B. Sheppard, of the struggling A. M. E. Church, Kingston, N. Y., mention of which was recently made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, writes: "Our work is advancing slowly for lack of means." This little congregation is making a heroic effort to build itself a church home and outside help will be appreciated.

P. A. S., Chicago, Ill. 1. Was Saint Peter married, and is there any positive information in the Bible or elsewhere on this point? 2. Also, where was the first church established?

1. Yes, he was married. See Matt. 8:14-17 and parallel passages. It is generally believed that he was married in early life to Perpetua, who accompanied him on his apostolic journeys. Ancient traditions, mentioned by Clement, of Alexandria, and some other early writers, state that Perpetua bore Peter a daughter, and perhaps other children, and that she suffered martyrdom. 2. Although the first meetings were held by the disciples and their following in Jerusalem, the first Christian church, so-called, was established in Antioch.

Wm. A. D., Denver, Col. Does it not seem, in view of what is now taking place throughout the world, that the human race is getting farther and farther away from God, and harking back to barbarism? Civilization, so-called, doesn't help it a bit. Look at Russia killing and torturing Jews and whipping Armenians to baptism, "in the name of God." Look at the Turk triumphing over the combined Powers, and butchering the Macedonians until he has made their land a shambles. Look at generally well-behaved Wales, now indulging in Jew-baiting. See how France has brutally thrust out its religious Orders. See Christian Germany upholding and applauding the bastly Turk. See England planning to smash Tibet, and grab that ancient territory which has been interfering with nobody. Look at ourselves, given over to gambling, lynching, bribes and the oppression of the poor. Where does Christianity come in? In what sense can you say that the world is growing better? To me it seems to be going to the dogs.

The situation is undoubtedly discouraging, but we may be quite sure that God rules, and that in the end the wisdom of his rule will be justified. We wonder that he does not interfere and summarily put an end to such outrages as those you enumerate, but that has never been his way. The Governments have to learn by painful experience that they cannot commit injustice or oppression without suffering for it. Witness Turkey, whose fairest provinces have been snatched away from it. empire. They are slow to learn, but learn they will in the end. It is God's way to let men learn by their own suffering the evil of sin. There is "a remnant" as the ancient prophets called it, of good men in every age working for righteousness. That remnant is steadily increasing in numbers, and in the end will attain control. You must have patience, as God has patience, and never lose faith in the promise that the time is coming when Christ shall rule the world in righteousness, and all nations will serve him.

Emma L., Passaic, N. J. Is there any foundation for the story of the Pied Piper of Hamelin, so familiar to our childhood?

Verstegan, in a volume entitled, "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence" (1634), relates that Hulberstadt, in Germany, was infested with rats, which a certain musician "called from his garments the Pyed Piper," agreed for payment to destroy. He did so; payment was refused, and he attracted all the children to the hill of Hamelen, near-by, where they were swallowed up. Many believed the story, and it was even affirmed that the event took place on July 22, 1376. If there ever was any foundation for it, however, it has probably been greatly exaggerated, so that its present form may be regarded as largely mythical, like "Blue Beard," and Whittington's cat.

Jessie L., Harlem N., Y. What King, while wooing a princess, threw her in the mud?

The incident referred to, is probably the wooing by William the Conqueror of Princess Matilda, as described in the Chronicle of Ingerbe—a somewhat dubious authority. The writer declares that William waylaid Matilda in the Bruges streets, "seized her, rolled her in the dirt, spoiled her gown, struck her, and then rode off at full speed." This apparently convinced Matilda of the sincerity of his attachment, suggests the chronicler, for she consented to become his wife. Another historian intimates that she accepted him, because she was probably afraid of a second encounter like the first.

A Voyage to the Lapps, Finns and Russians

Across the Great White Sea

...By...
FREDERICK A. NORTH

ARCHANGEL, Aug. 4, 1903.

TO the distant reader, the terms: Frigid Zone, North Cape, Arctic Ocean, Lapland, White Sea, Archangel and Dwina River, convey to the mind substantially the same ideas as the words; cold, blizzard, winter, snow, frozen, ice and sledge. Yet, to-day, here on the streets of Archangel, upon the banks of the Dwina, and close under the Arctic Circle, the heat has been nearly as great as I ever experienced in New York. At three o'clock this afternoon, a black thunder-shower came up from the forests of the southwest, in the regular American style, and broke in fury over the rich delta lands of the Dwina, drenching the elaborate decorations displayed in the city, in celebration of the Czarina's birthday. Archangel's summers are short and hot, but her winters are long and very cold.

From Vardo, the extreme northeast town of Norway, far above the Arctic Circle, where I wrote my former letter, to Archangel, stopping in Lapland, Finland, and several other places on the shores of the Arctic Ocean and White Sea, my voyage was full of interest. At low twelve, just as the last midnight sun of 1903 faintly gleamed a half-disc good-by across the dark waves of the Polar Sea, I took passage with many strange dwellers in the far north, on the large new Russian White Sea steamer Emperor Nicholas II. During the long chilly day of half rain and half fog that followed, I visited the ports of Petsenga and Vaidguba, and saw the native little Lapps dressed in reindeer furs, wearing square-cornered caps, seal-skin moccasins with long-pointed upturned toes, fur mittens and high collars. Lapland is an ethnological, rather than a geographical term. Occupying the most northern portion of continental Europe, the Lapps number 21,000 in Norway, 7,000 in Sweden, and 2,000 in Russia. They were crowded out and driven to their present position by the Finns. Fish and reindeer furnish the Lapps their chief means of living. Their ceremony of marriage still contains the form of primitive abduction, wherein the bride feigns to cry and struggle, but the father remits all to the husband for money consideration. The Lapps were originally nomadic, but now most of them live in villages and rude huts.

Steaming several miles up the wide and deep river Kola, we came to the lumbering settlement and great steam sawmill of Kola, the most northern town of European Russia. Vast quantities of logs are rafted down the river from the interior and are here sawn into boards. Both banks of the river at this point are covered with dwarf white birches. The captain told me that a British man-of war burned the town in the year 1854, but it had been rebuilt.

Our next point visited was Alexandrovsk, a new experiment station and Russian naval headquarters. It is the intention of the government to find out, by scientific demonstration, whether settlements for the pursuit of agriculture, or fishing, or for commercial or naval purposes, can be maintained so far north in the Frigid Zone. Everything here is new. The magnificent Greek church, with blue and gold dome, standing on the granite heights; the half dozen general stores, the schoolhouse, the excellent steamboat wharf, the horse railroad for freight, the hundred comfortable new dwelling houses, the wide board-walks, the post-office, the naval hotel, the tower to determine wind, rain, temperature and amount of sunlight—all have been recently constructed. These provisions show Russia's foresight and her determination to continue mistress of the Northern Seas. This is a good harbor, large and deep enough for a whole fleet of warships, and it should be remembered that while all White Sea ports are ice-bound nine months annually, Alexandrovsk remains free from ice the year round. What real use can Russia have for such a naval station in the Arctic Ocean?

As we were about to leave port, a Lapp came on board, who with his well-dressed and interesting family—handsome, chubby, little wife, two bright boys, and a baby carried by the mother as an Indian papoose in a decorated seal-skin cradle—was on his way to fetch some reindeer which I saw pasturing on a large grassy island near the village of Malo-Oleny. This family, according to the custom of those who move about, took along all their household effects and camping necessaries. The man also had a gun, a pair of antlers, an accordeon, and a whiskey bottle. The dainty little woman took care of baggage and children, while her easy-going husband went below to enjoy himself gossiping, drinking and playing the accordeon with the boatmen—Russians, Lapps, Finns, Swedes and Norsemen. As soon as the steamer had come well out from the land the sea grew rough, and wife, boys, baby and dog became distressingly seasick.

A FAMILY OF LAPLANDERS AND THEIR SUMMER TENT

As soon as we dropped anchor before the little fishing town of Malo-Oleny, about fifty cable boats filled with Russian fishermen surrounded our steamer, and all at once the men, with shouts, coming up stairs, ladders and ropes, like pirates, or like the Arabs at Jaffa and Beirut, quickly crowded the deck. Some wanted passage, some desired to take passengers ashore, some sought prices, others bought custom-house stamps of the purser, and some inquired for information and advice. These Russian fishermen are very religious, but they are also fond of ardent spirits. Nevertheless the people along this coast are very good to fish-

The Plague of Gambling

TEXT — Gen. 3: 19: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread"

SOME years ago, I was walking in beautiful Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, with my father. He suddenly turned and said to me, "Frank, next week I am going to write a sermon upon the question, 'Is life worth living?' I am going to show that the solution of that question is conditional. Whether life is or is not worth living depends upon how you live it. If a man lives in this world, with the idea that he is only to receive and not to give; if he is cursed with the enervating conviction that he must be carried around on a litter, and if he does not want to be a worker, a laborer, a doer for mankind, then life is not worth living. The sooner that man is dead the better. But if a man goes through this world realizing the glorious opportunities of Christian usefulness, and if he is willing to spend and be spent for others, then life is worth living. Then the longer we live on earth the happier we shall be, and the more we shall make others happy."

But though at the Edenic expulsion, the divine command was given: "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," yet from time immemorial there have been thousands upon thousands of men and women who have tried to shirk the obligations of labor which God has placed at every hearthstone. They have been seeking a means whereby, through the opened door of the Roman Temple erected to Fortuna, the Goddess of Chance, they could possess a fortune without working for it, or of contributing anything to the world in return for it. They would be

Wreckers, Pure and Simple

They would become vampires upon the social organism, sucking out the life's blood of others, as the Australian bats fasten themselves upon the backs of the horses, cattle and sheep, until they have drunk their fill, or as the European cuckoo lays her eggs in the nests of other birds, or as a parasitical plant, which absorbs the nourishment of other plants. They would drink, yet never themselves become fountains of water at whose sparkling springs others might quench their thirst.

In every age there have been thousands upon thousands of devotees at Fortuna's shrine. They are blind worshipers of a blind goddess. The ancient Romans showed their wisdom in picturing her with eyes shut and large wings on her feet. She sees nothing of the sacrifices of her worshipers, and she cares nothing for the heart-break of those who have given her their all. She cares not whose fortune she snatches away. When she gathers up the gold in her arms, those wings on her feet can make her and her treasured burden disappear as quickly as a roulette wheel can whirl, as quickly as a man's deed for his house can change hands at the turning of a card, as quickly as a race-horse can travel about the track of a Derby. The Goddess of Chance can fly away so quickly that in an instant a man can be ruined for time and for eternity.

My theme is defiant gambling. Defiant, yea! The gambler defies God, and in utter recklessness stakes his fortune in this world and his hopes of the next. This accursed evil is a violation of God's laws as well as man's. Defiant because when the winnings and losings of a gambler's lifetime are balanced, it will inevitably be found that the Demon Fortuna has robbed her victim both of his soul and his pocketbook. The smile of this evil genius is more to be dreaded than her frown. The smile allures, but it hides the scowl which might warn the devotee of the ruthlessness with which she intends completely and eternally to destroy him. The hangman's suavities do not make the rope's grip less fatal; neither did the politeness and deference with which the Parisian executioner welcomed Louis XVI. to the guillotine blunt the edge of the descending knife.

Waste and Robbery

Gambling is robbery. It takes wealth and gives nothing in return. It puts not one copper into the world's treasury. It plants no seed; it digs no gold from the mine; it grows no wool upon the sheep's back; it builds no steamship lines; it manufactures no goods, and it retails no finished products. It does nothing for national or social development. It had no more to do with the marvelous development of the twentieth century than the vast riches of the piratical buccaneers of old had to do with creating the wealth of the fourteenth and the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Its mission is always ruinous. Ever does it raise a black flag of death and never the white flag, which should always be carried by the "Heroes of Peace."

Gambling cannot even lay claim to the indirect advantages which a legitimate business provides for the community. Every legitimate business is a benefit to mankind. When a man like old Commodore Vanderbilt started out to make a success in this world, not even his most intimate friends could charge him with being an intentional philanthropist. Any one who had any financial dealings with old Cornelius always knew that he was looking out first and last for himself, and for himself alone. But when Cornelius Vanderbilt, in the legitimate role of railroad developer, served himself, he was also serving mankind. His railroads gave employment to thousands and tens of thousands of men, and supported those men's families. His iron roads developed whole regions in the West, which would never have been opened by any other pioneer than the cyclopean eye of the locomotive's headlight. When old Cornelius Vanderbilt made millions of dollars for himself, he also made millions for his employees, and hundreds of millions for his country.

Phenomenal Losses

But what benefit either in progress or in increase of capital did the world receive, when in 1861, a man by the name of Garcia, at the Hamburg gambling resort, won in one night 1,750,000 francs; or when about the same time, in Wiesbaden, two Frenchmen lost 3,000,000 francs; or when, a few years ago, Khalil Bey lost at the gaming table $2,000,000 which he had inherited from his father; or when the niece of Cardinal Mazarin, won in a single sitting from the Duchess of Portsmouth $40,000; or Lady Castlemaine, of Charles the Second's court, lost in one night over $125,000. Did all these transactions increase the world's wealth by the value of one five-cent loaf of bread? Did they help, in one instance, to feed the hungry, or give employment to the poor?

When, under the evil manipulations of the Wall Street gamblers, the railroad stock of a large corporation is "watered," and its price made to jump up and fall as the thermometer's quicksilver drops at the touch of the October frosts, and thousands upon thousands of small gamblers, who have bought their railroad stock upon "margins," and not as a true investment, are frozen out, does such Wall Street gambling build one freight car, or span one river with a new bridge, or erect one new depot, or upholster one Pullman sleeper? The Puritans used to call a pack of cards the "Devil's prayer book." Did you ever hear of the "Devil's prayer book" teaching the gamester how he could be a producer and not a destroyer? No, my friends, no, no, no! Anything but that. The gambling habit never created one farthing for the welfare of any community.

Debauchers of Society

Thus, my brother, I congratulate you if you have never been a gambler, or in league with gamblers. I congratulate you if you are one of those men unwilling to be a parasite, a vampire, or absorbent of other men's industries. I congratulate you, even though you may never have amassed the illegitimate fortune of a Baron Blanc, whose international gambling crimes have created a Monte Carlo, or of a Benazet, or a Devaux, who used to run the gambling casinos of a Spa, an Aix-la-Chapelle, or a Baden-Baden, before the German Parliament, in 1872, bid them begone; or the illegitimate fortunes of the evil owners of a Louisiana Lottery, who, year after year, flagrantly bribed a State Legislature, until, at last, the outraged Christian people of that commonwealth, with the aid of the United States Postmaster-General, rose in their might, and destroyed this accursed and debauching infamy. Never have any dealings in any way with defiant gambling. The man who wrote under the nom de plume of M. Rouge-et-Noir, in his remarkable book called The Gambling World, declared that when Greece was in the height of her glory, a Lacedæmonian ambassador was sent to Corinth with a commission to enter into a treaty of friendship and alliance. But when the foreign noble saw that the senators and the leading statesmen of Corinth thought more of their dice than they did of their national honor, he returned home without concluding a treaty; "for," said he, "I will not sully the glory of the Spartans by having it said that they made a league with gamesters." So, my brother, I congratulate you if, like the Lacedæmonian ambassador, you have refused to be a denizen of the gambling world, or in league with gamesters.

Demoralized Character

The gambling passion not only robs men of their fortunes, but demoralizes their minds. It unfits its victims for the common duties of ordinary life. It over-stimulates the brain and the imagination, until, after awhile, work—honest, hard, practical work—has for the gambler's diseased mind, the same kind of repulsion that a glass of rich dairy milk has for the inflamed throat of a chronic drunkard, or the sight of a clear cool stream of water for the bloodshot eye of a mad dog, whose tongue and mouth are covered with the white foam of fatal hydrophobia.

The healthful desire for work and the gambler's passion do not nest in the same heart. They belong not to the same brood of children. They are never nourished by the same mother. When the young man, fresh from a Christian home, first hears the rattle of a dice-box and is led into the sanctum sanctorum of the baccarat seance, all his noblest sensibilities are intensely shocked. But as his astonished eyes see great piles of coin and greenbacks being passed across the table, after awhile fascination drives away fear. Then the warnings and restraints of a rebuking conscience are shaken off with such questions as these: "What is the use of my working hard every day of the week, except Sunday, and only receiving six or ten dollars a week on pay night, when I might earn ten times that sum in a quiet game? So the gambler's cupidity begins to work. The young man's brain becomes befuddled. He shirks his daily tasks. As a poor, diseased, mental incompetent who is striving to solve the impossible mathematical problem of perpetual motion, he tries to work out a system of "How to break the bank." He studies "chance books." He hunts up his guiding star, or the star which shone brightest on the night upon which he was born. Then, at last, with all reasoning powers gone and blinded to all the duties of ordinary life, the crazed enthusiast will haunt the gaming table, as he once gladly sought his study desk, or the store-room counter.

Robbed of Property and Liberty

Young men, I solemnly appeal to you. Some of you have already heard the sound of the clicking roulette wheel. Are you going to throw your life away at the altar of chance? Are you going to unfit yourselves for the duties of life by the gambler's craze? I assure you that, without bravely and faithfully fulfilling the ordinary daily tasks, you will never succeed in anything. The evil demon called Fortuna will beggar you and enslave you. If you frequent her shrine, you will sacrifice your liberty as surely as did that free negro upon the Mississippi steamboat before the war. He first wagered his money and lost. Then, at last, he placed his "papers of freedom" upon the centre of the table, and gambled his black skin back into the Alabama cotton fields, and into the Louisiana rice swamps. An old Spanish proverb says: "The free man, who deliberately sells himself into voluntary servitude, is a fool." The Goddess of Chance strips a man of what he has saved, and she also robs him of the position by which he can earn honestly his daily bread.

I charge upon this gambling mania a direct robbery of the Christian world, in that by besoiling legitimate recreations with its foul touch, it has made it impossible for decent men to enjoy certain healthful relaxations. It is gradually stealing from us the privilege of enjoying outdoor sports and indoor games, by identifying them with betting and speculation. Whenever the leprous hand of the gambler is placed upon a game, that sport must be forever eschewed by the good.

Without the damning influence of the crowd of bookmakers, the race-horse would not attract enough people to-day as a money investment to pay for his oats and his blankets. On account of the gambling evil, even the bowling alley to-day, the public billiard table, the yachtsman's white sail, and college athletics are under condemnation. In view of the immense amount of money which changes hands at every football game, it is a very grave question whether it would not be better for the different college faculties to cast their influence against every sport which would take students away from the home campus.

Leads to Defalcation

But there is another reason why I denounced defiant gambling. This evil mania leads its victims to squander other people's money, as well as their own. Now I am not alluding to the poor, half-crazed clerk, who will steal from his employer in order to bet on the races. I am not alluding to the poor servant-girl, who opens her mistress's pocketbook in order to take out a fifty-cent piece to squander it in a policy shop; or to the bank president, who as trustee of an estate, criminally sinks in wild-cat speculations the money entrusted to his care. They are criminals, and they know it. But I am alluding to those who think they are wagering only that money which is theirs by right.

Young man, you say that you own your own money and have a right to do with it as you will? No, you have not. Where did you get that money? "Oh," you say, "Father left it to me in his will." For what did he leave it to you? Did he not leave it as a trust? Did he not leave it to you, in order that you, with it could continue to spread abroad his Christian influence? Money is a representative word. Do you tell me, O man,

NEW YORK'S ITALIAN COLONY ✻

Rev. A. Dassori's Missionary Labors Among the Immigrants

ONE of the most interesting varieties of Christian work in the densely populated sections of New York City, is that carried on among the Italian immigrants by Rev. Agostino Dassori and his wife. It is a combination of the characteristic features of an International Church, a Gospel Settlement, and a Mission. The conductors have evidently studied closely the habits and conditions of the people, whose moral and spiritual welfare they are trying to promote, and have used without any hesitation the best measures for effecting their object. The result is a deep and rapidly growing interest in the Italian colony in religion, and an increasing disposition to listen to the Gospel teaching of the workers.

Mr. Dassori is an Italian, and has consequently the inestimable advantage of familiarity with the language of the Italian quarter. Soon after his conversion, in 1882, he experienced an intense concern for the conversion of his fellow-countrymen, of whom more than 200,000 have settled in lower New York. Like the great apostle of the Gentiles, he felt especially called to labor among his "kindred according to the flesh." His first effort was as a Sunday School teacher, in Mariners' Temple, in which he was, himself, brought into the light. He also spoke frequently at the Italian mission quarters in Crosby street. The news of his addresses in the Italian language, quickly spread. The attendance increased, and so much good was being done, that eventually the mission was put under Mr. Dassori's charge, and the Baptist City Mission assumed the financial support of the work. There were only some ten Italians in attendance at the beginning, but in a short time there were about 140 as a regular audience, and among those, many who were converted.

In spite of warnings from the priests, and though social influences were brought to bear, the number of Italians attending the mission services steadily increased. It was uphill work, for there were defects of education to overcome, old associations to eradicate, and all the pomp and ceremony of the Roman Catholic services to compete with. It is a proof of the encouraging and sustaining power of Christ, that Mr. and Mrs. Dassori should have continued their work in the face of so much to depress them. They were rewarded by witnessing some very remarkable conversions, and in 1896 it became necessary to organize a church. There are now 133 members and the enquirers among the congregation are multiplying. Already the church has borne mission fruit, in a family who went from among the converts to South America, and in their new home have begun Gospel work.

Among the plans adopted to reach the members of the colony, is a mothers' meeting, held in the church on Wednesday afternoons, at which sewing and the cutting out of garments are taught, and a Bible reading is given. Many women, conscious of their own deficiencies in the use of the needle, have attended, and have learned the Gospel message, in addition to their other education. They are also visited in their homes by a devoted worker, who uses her opportunities of cheering and helping them. On Thursday afternoons the girls have their good time. The Little Mothers' Club, composed of 125 children, who have the care of their baby brothers and sisters while their mothers are at work, is entertained with games and are taught Bible lessons.

Other agencies are the young men's club, for boys of fourteen to twenty years of age, and a boys' club of younger members, who appreciate the privileges of a weekly meeting. There is also a sewing school for girls, and a housekeeping class for working girls. One of the fruits of these various agencies, is a direct promise of future usefulness. Miss Eleonora Vaccaneo, the daughter of believing parents, has now gone to Northfield to be trained for mission work among her people. Among the active members of the church are two girls, who, with their aunt, were first attracted to the church by the open-air preaching, which Mr. Dassori practises all through the summer in the parks and squares of the Italian quarter. The Sunday school has now 95 children on its rolls, and is divided into three grades—primary, junior and advanced. Mrs. Dassori gives this her special attention, and teaches the international lesson, with the black board, from the platform. Many adults are always present.

Considering how enormous is the Italian immigration, and how many new denizens are added every year to the Italian colony in the city, the value of such a work as the Dassoris are doing, is obvious. They need all the help and encouragement that can be given to them, for they are serving the country, as well as the church, by winning for Christ men, women and children who came here ignorant of all that tends to spiritual and moral development.

that at the gambling-table, you have a right to squander your mother's and father's substance like that?

"But," some one else says, "the money I have is mine. Why? I did not inherit it, or have it given to me. I made it. Therefore I have a right to do with it as I please." Oh, no, my brother, you have not. That money which you made is not yours. It belongs to your children. When your little children came into the world, they brought to you certain moral obligations. You had no right to become a father, unless you were ready, to the best of your ability, to look after your babies. That money which you squander at the gambling-table means more than money. It means your children's clothes, your children's schooling, your children's proper start in life.

"But," says some one again, "It is not certain that I should lose. If I win at the gambling-table, I am guiltless of the wrongs against parents and children that you are denouncing." Well, my brother, with a gambling tendency, you have no right to suppose any such case. All gamblers—shall I say, all, yes, practically all—ultimately lose every cent they ever win at Fortuna's altar. There are practically no exceptions to this rule. Fortuna's Temple was built for the Goddess of Chance, but in gambling there is no chance, the devotee practically loses all. If this statement is not true, how can you account for the fact that every year the annual expenditures to run Monte Carlo are $5,000,000, and yet each year the shareholders of that evil resort divide nearly $3,000,000 profits? Over every gambling den of the world you can write the words, "Only the deluded enter here." Over every gambling-table you can see the trembling hands of dying men lifted, not to take money, but ultimately to leave their all.

All "systems" which have ever been devised to break the "Bank of Chance" were failures, and they are always sure to be failures. In a Chinese temple I have seen the poor invalids before a hideous idol of wood make a prayer to their "God of Health," and then select at random an arrow out of a wampun, with a certain medicine marked upon it, and expect that that medicine would cure them of their disease. So I have seen poor dupes in Monte Carlo, in the same foolish way, trying to work out a "system" by which the God of Chance would give to them unlimited wealth. As all such "systems" are failures and will always be failures, I would to-day give you a "system," which, if worked out, will bring a competency and eternal happiness, if not unlimited gold. This is my system. Never in your life try to possess a dollar, unless you are ready to give an equivalent in labor and sweat and toil. Never spend a dollar, unless you have first earned it, and have it in your possession. Never run into debt. Never, by speculation, or by progressive euchre parties, or by "prizes" at church fair, or by "raffle," contribute in any way the development of the gambling spirit in others. Draw beside from one Bank only, and that the great Bank of Divine Grace. Circulate in every way as bank-notes of kindness and forgiveness and sympathy. Let your one great purpose be, not "How can I make others serve me," but "How can I serve others." Let your faith, hope and peace be centred in Christ the Saviour of men, and make him the Guide and King of your life. Such a "system" as I have marked out is a sure system. It is Christ's system. It will never bankrupt you this side of the grave, except of your own meanness. And it is sure to bring you perfect peace beyond the grave, and give to you all the limitless wealth of the Treasure City of God.

Ecuador's Religious Revolution

Weary of Saint and Tithes

THERE is much in the history of Ecuador which is common to all the South American republics. There is the story of discovery, followed by the cruel treatment and final subjugation of the aboriginal tribes; her colonial existence, when, for nearly three centuries, as a part of New Granada (now Venezuela, Colombia and Ecuador), she suffered under the tyrannical hand of the mother country. Then followed her struggle for independence, followed by long years of internal warfare between factions led by ambitious men, and finally, her successful struggle for religious liberty, which has been the one great event in her history.

The year 1896 marked the close of the conservative, anti-progressive and inquisitorial rule, and the beginning of a new era of reform along all lines, religious as well as secular. Prior to this, the celebration of any form of worship other than that of the Roman Catholic faith, which was the religion of State, was punishable by a term of years in the penitentiary, followed by banishment for another term of years. No Protestant Bible could pass the custom-house, and the circulation of all evangelical literature was forbidden. Mr. Penzotti, an agent of the American Bible Society, laboring in Spanish America, told the writer of an attempt he had once made at holding some meetings in a native's house; but he was soon aware of being watched by the authorities, and had to abandon them.

And in other countries, clericalism brought about its own downfall by the tyrannical and intolerant spirit which it manifested; but the clericals were in power, and the struggle for their dislodgement was a long and bitter one. There were a few men whose writings and utterances had long been educating the public mind in the way of religious freedom. Notably among these was Juan Montalos, who, some years ago, died in exile, and whose writings are at the present time being edited for publication at government expense.

The "Away from Rome" movement was not, however, prompted by any positive religious conviction on the part of those foremost in it. On the contrary, many of the leading liberals pride themselves on being "free thinkers." Brought up to look upon the Church of Rome as the repository of the true faith on the earth, and being utterly ignorant of evangelical beliefs, when they lost faith in the religion of the fathers they lost faith in Christianity itself. But men were weary of the tithe system, which was a source of income to the Church, and of the many other exactions, and, above all, of the way in which political power was exercised by the clergy for their own pecuniary gain and for the impoverishment of the masses. So it was that when the opportunity for a revolution presented itself, the educated classes were in great measure prepared for the change to a liberal government. And whatever the motives behind the movement, as concerns those engaged in it, this is but another instance that shows how, in these times, God is opening doors and removing barriers, that the Gospel of his Son might be preached among all nations.

The term "Mariolatry" might not unfittingly be applied to the religion prevailing in South America. A whole month of the year is devoted to her service. Her image occupies a foremost place in the religious processions, and the most prominent position in all the churches. The other saints, however, come in for their share of attention. Every town is dedicated to some saint. Every child must be baptized in the name of a saint, and the anniversary he thereafter celebrates as his birthday is the day which the Church observes in honor of the particular saint whose name he bears. For instance, every one bearing the name of Anthony, celebrates as his birthday the regular feast-day held in honor of St. Anthony; all bearing the name of Mary, the regular feast-day of St. Mary, etc. When our child was born, the nurse, after consulting the calendar, informed us that he should be called Gabriel, as it seems he was born on the day dedicated to this saint, who, according to native beliefs, would undertake to look after the child in after years.

It was in October, 1896, that the writer, in company with another missionary, first landed in Guayaquil, the principal port of the country. Our first work was the study of Spanish, which is different from that spoken in Spain only in the matter of pronunciation. After acquiring sufficient knowledge of the language to make ourselves understood in ordinary conversation, we found a very useful occupation in selling Bibles and distributing Gospel tracts among the people. This not only gave us practice in what we had learned in the text-book but laid the foundation for more thorough work in the future.

We soon gained some knowledge of the ways of the people, and learned something of what we must encounter in the way of prejudice and superstition in the future of the work. These were people who claimed to be Christians, and yet were often ignorant of the very existence of the Bible. We found them very much prejudiced against Protestants and Protestantism, and yet entirely ignorant of our beliefs and practices. Among the masses, the idea prevailed that Protestants were atheists, infidels, not believing in God, and despising Mary and the saints.

When not intoxicated, or influenced by some evil intentioned persons of the upper class, the people are naturally docile, and disinclined to acts of violence. Like their Spanish forefathers, they are very polite and hospitable, and the politeness, although somewhat superficial, extends to all classes and conditions of society. We have often been touched, while moving among the lower classes, by seeing their expression of gratitude for some small favor shown them. Very often when giving some poor woman a small booklet or tracts, she has responded by offering us something in return—as an egg, or something to eat.

From lack of good example on the part of their spiritual leaders, immorality abounds among all classes, and children are often taught to lie and steal. Yet they have so many good traits that one may soon learn to like them, and long and pray for their salvation. The great need of the country at present is the Gospel. The poor have no conception of a living Christ, who may abide in the heart of men and transform their lives. Their religion is a joyless religion—an endless doing of penances and performance of ceremonies, wherein the heart finds no peace.

There are many towns and villages—even cities—still without a missionary, where one would be welcomed by a good percentage of the population, and conditions would be favorable for an ingathering of precious spiritual fruit. We would that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might remember this needy field in prayer.

The present government, like the preceding one, encourages evangelistic work, if not actively, at least by affording protection to the missionary. And one of the proofs of the progressive tendencies of the present government has been the passage of the Civil Marriage Law, which legalizes marriages solemnized outside the Church of Rome, thus removing a great embarrassment to the growth of the evangelical cause in the republic.

AN IDEAL HOME FOR YOUNG MEN

One of the Finest and Most Attractive Y. M. C. A. Buildings in America Nearing Completion

BY HARRY STEELE MORRISON

"WHEN I was tired and hungry I would look for a chop-house, dine, and then walk slowly home to my lodgings, taking a cup of coffee at a coffee-house on the way. . . . I ought to have stayed at home in the evening and worked, but Featherstone Buildings is a very quiet place. In the evening the place was absolutely silent; the silence sometimes helped me in my work; sometimes it got on my nerves and became intolerable. I would then go out and wander about the streets for the sake of animation, the crowds, and the lights; or I would go half-price—a shilling—to the pit of a theatre, or I would drop into a casino and sit in a corner and look on at the dancing. . . . The thing was risky, but I came to no harm. To this day I cannot think of those lonely evenings in my London lodging without a touch of the old terror. I see myself sitting at a table, books spread out before me. I get to work. Presently I sit up and look around. The silence is too much for me. I take my hat and go out. There are thousands of young fellows to-day who find, as I found every evening, the silence and loneliness intolerable."

The above is an extract from the autobiography of Sir Walter Besant, and vividly describes the loneliness of thousands of young men who are beginning life in the great cities of the world. Living in solitary lodgings, away from family and friends, it is not strange that so many of them seek distraction in the streets and places of amusement, where they are influenced by evil companions and doubtful pleasures.

New York is full of young men. They flock to the metropolis from every part of America, some to begin a business career, and others to enter the art and professional schools. Arriving in the city, alone and friendless, they face the problem of living. The best of city boarding-houses are cheerless places, and few find them attractive on a long winter evening. It is more interesting in the streets and at the theatre, and the strange youth finds himself more and more inclined to spend his evenings out.

There is now nearing completion in New York, a building which will prove a happy home for lonely men. It is the new structure of the Twenty-third street branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, which has been in course of erection for nearly two years. Although called a branch, the Twenty-third street organization is the parent association of the kind in New York, and it has occupied its old building, at Twenty-third street and Fourth avenue, for more than thirty-three years. It was the first to provide educational, physical and social, as well as religious privileges for young men, and its gymnasium was the first to be conducted under Association management. During all these years, it has served as a resort where young men could spend their spare time with pleasure and profit. The new building will accommodate many more members, and the influence of the Association will be consequently extended. All its lines of work, except the physical department, are being vigorously carried on in temporary quarters, so the Association will not lose ground during the building operations.

This new structure is on the north side of Twenty-third street, about 200 feet west of Seventh avenue, and runs through to Twenty-fourth street. It is 74 feet wide, and will contain 9 stories, its height from the sidewalk being 120 feet. A statement of its cost shows that the site required $170,000; building, $585,000; furnishings, $45,000; interest, taxes and other expenses, $60,000, making a total of $860,000. The proceeds of the sale of the old building being $700,000, the Association still has $160,000 to raise, $104,000 of which has already been pledged.

The new building will differ from many erected by the Young Men's Christian Association, in the fact that there will be no stores or studios, to wit, the entire structure being devoted to the Association purposes. There will be nothing lacking to make the place attractive and helpful to young men. The architecture of both fronts is an adaptation of the Italian renaissance.

In the basement, which is uncommonly high, the windows being level with the sidewalk, there will be a members' restaurant, a barber shop, bathrooms, bicycle storage, and a very fine engine and boiler-room. The Twenty-third street entrance to the first floor leads into a "social room," 27 x 52 feet, which will be the centre of the life of the building. From this room, electric elevators will run to the educational class rooms, the library and the gymnasium. Opening out of it will be rooms for the business offices of the Association, and for the Employment Bureau, which last year obtained 1,222 positions for men and boys. The work of this bureau will be very much enlarged in the new building.

The first story will be so constructed, with sliding and folding doors, that, at large receptions, the whole floor can be thrown into practically one great room, extending from one street to the other. Ordinarily, the reception room, 27 x 28 feet, will be used for games, such as chess, ping-pong, and shuffleboard.

In the rear of the main social room will be two rooms, which can be used alternately for Bible classes, lectures, and receptions, or other social affairs. The walls of the social room will be decorated with stags' heads and similar objects, of which the Association has already quite a number. It has also received as gifts, many valuable pictures. An effort will be made to decorate and furnish the entire building in a homelike manner, so that it will seem like a club-house for young men, rather than an institution.

THE BEAUTIFUL NEW Y. M. C. A. BUILDING IN NEW YORK

It is expected that floral friends of the poor will furnish parts of the building as memorials. The gifts of the kind have already been made. One floor is to be for the boys' gymnasium, as necessary as a schoolroom in south, the other is a floor for the boys' classes of the Institute's patronage.

One of the most successful features of the Association work in Twenty-third street has been the educational classes, and these will be greatly increased in the new building. All of the second floor except the part occupied by the gallery of Association Hall, will be devoted to the educational class rooms, the largest of which, for the book keeping classes will accommodate one hundred men, seated at desks. The third floor will provide rooms for social and educational clubs, such as the Camera Club, now formed, and other clubs to be organized.

An especially valuable feature of the new building will be the library and reading room, which will occupy nearly one-half of the fourth floor. The Association now has over 11,000 volumes of miscellaneous literature, carefully selected, and it will provide stack room for 10,000 more, which it hopes to secure through gifts. The best papers and periodicals of all descriptions will be supplied in the reading-room, which is especially fortunate in light and ventilation.

One of the principal objects of the Young Men's Christian Association is to provide for the care and development of the body. For thirty-three years the Twenty-third street Department has been offering to young men in New York the opportunity of gaining and maintaining strong, healthy bodies, and thousands of them have found in the Association gymnasium that recreation and healthful exercise which have proved the antidote to the nervous strain of metropolitan life. Thousands more are sure to be attracted by the accommodations offered in the new building. The gymnasium will occupy the entire seventh floor, running through to the eighth, and having light from four sides and from two skylights. It is to be entirely lined with buff-colored brick. In it will be a running track, twenty laps to the mile, and a spectators' gallery. Opening out of it will be rooms for private exercise and those of the Physical Director. The fifth and sixth stories will contain four bowling alleys, and the locker rooms for the men's gymnasium. For the latter, there will be 1,200 lockers, and for the boys' gymnasium, 400. In the sixth story will be a large bathroom, containing twenty-one shower baths, and a swimming pool 25 x 58 feet. It is very unusual for a plunge bath to be located in an upper story of a building, and this one in Twenty-third street will be unique.

The electric elevators will run from the first floor to the roof, where there will be a spacious garden, commanding a view of New York and the surrounding districts. This is expected to be a popular resort on summer nights. In the Twenty-third street end of the building will be a suite of rooms for the boys' department, with capacity for a membership of 500. The boys, from twelve to sixteen years, will have a reception room, reading room, lecture room, Bible class room, and a separate roof garden, large enough for the playing of basket ball and other games.

The upper six stories at the Twenty-third street end will be devoted to dormitories for members of the Association, divided into rooms of various sizes, to be used either singly or en suite. These rooms will be rented for from $2.50 to $8.00 a week, and already there are more applications for them than can be filled. Good lodgings at reasonable prices are not easily found in New York, and young men will appreciate the advantages of those in the new building.

The vast scope of the work done by the Young Men's Christian Association in New York can be realized when it is stated that there are 10,000 members in all, and a well-equipped building for their use. The Twenty-third street branch alone has more than 2,000 members, of whom 735 use the gymnasium in one, and nearly 600 were in the educational classes. The attendance at socials and entertainments was over 24,000, and at religious meetings and Bible classes, over 16,000. The average daily attendance at the old Twenty-third street Building last year was 1,150.

A Hopeful Augury

AS a sign of the trend of international relations, the news cabled here last week of the negotiation of a treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and France, is decidedly encouraging. The terms of the treaty have not yet been fully disclosed, but sufficient is known of them to make it clear that war between those nations in the future is now made more improbable. It is also gratifying to learn that the new treaty was modelled on that negotiated by Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote on behalf of our Government and that of England, which failed of confirmation by the Senate. It is a distinct tribute to our State Department, that the document should have served the useful purpose of bringing into harmonious relations these two historic foes. Though it failed of the purpose for which it was designed, its indirect benefit to others must be a great pleasure to the great statesman at the head of our State Department.

It appears that the new treaty does not bind the two contracting parties to resort to arbitration in any dispute that may arise, but it does provide a method by which disputes susceptible of a peaceful settlement may be adjusted. That is a distinct gain, because in the heat of resentment engendered by an international quarrel, it is not so easy to settle a means of amicable arrangement, as it is in a period of good feeling. We may be quite sure that the two nations, realizing fully how terrible a war between them would be to both, will not now lightly exclude from the sphere of arbitration any question, unless it involves the national honor of one or both.

Perhaps the good work may extend still further. Other European nations have as much reason as these to shrink from the horrors of war. The example now set, may be useful to them. If it came to be generally recognized that all disputes of a certain category might be settled by arbitration, that category might gradually extend, until all governments realized that there was no need of the enormous armies which are now being maintained at the cost of peaceful citizens.

A Little Music

WE have grown so critical and so fastidious, not to say so exacting, in these latter days, that one of the old-time delights is on the wane. True, there is still a piano in almost every home, not invariably in tune, or there is a mandolin, a cabinet organ, a banjo, or a violin; but if you want a little music, you find it an article almost as extinct as a pre-historic species. If there is a young girl in the family who has taken piano lessons for some years, and spent hours upon hours when she might have been out of doors in the sunshine, or in the kitchen helping her mother, in tedious practicing of scales and variations, her father naturally fancies that she might occasionally play for him. In the evening, when he is tired and has his slippers on, and has finished reading the paper, or when friends come in, and he innocently wishes to display her accomplishment. But Molly always has an excuse ready, and the finer artist she is, the swifter comes her apology and the profounder and politer is her regret. It would really seem that the most musical people are those who are least likely, so to speak, to have any music in stock. They scorn the little, simple, merry tunes, the sentimental things that clutch at the heart-strings of the unsophisticated, and the deep, solemn, beautiful, lovable music that they adore, is beyond their presentation unless they are spending their lives at the keyboard, or at exhausting study of some sort. Plain, hard-working fathers and mothers who have paid large bills for their children's musical training, wonder where the money has gone, but they seldom say much about it.

Once upon a time, when Belinda's mother was a girl, she took piano lessons. They did not cost much, and they were perhaps rather superficial. But she went through an exercise book, and proudly took pieces at the same time. "Mocking-Bird," and "Silver Chimes," and "Monastery Bells," and "Home, Sweet Home," were among the jingling melodies she learned to play, her slender fingers flashing over the keys, the "four and twenty black slaves," and the "four and twenty white," responsive to her touch. She pounded, no doubt, and she used the pedal, and thought the muffled thunder fortissimo effect singularly fine, and it was all crude and inartistic and amateurish, but it gave a lot of real homey satisfaction, of real, downright, every-day pleasure. Then, without any particular teaching, she used to sing ever so many ballads, and lyrics, and love-songs that the whole family joined in, father always contributing a deep, rumbling bass.

A little music, truly, but what a happy ending it made possible for many a weary day. Is it not just within the bounds of fancy, that a little ordinary music is better than none, and that something quite precious and quite charming has gone away from us, in this day of greater knowledge and broader culture?

We plead for a little music in the home, the kind of music that unmusical folk can understand and enjoy. If it is eluding us, let us summon it back.

The Folded Hands

FOR those who have met with disappointment, who have not climbed as far up the hill as they had hoped to climb, who have been "laid aside," or "shut in," or who have never been summoned to great deeds —there is a sweet consolation in this story of the "folded hands."

In the biography of Albrecht Durer, the most famous of the old German painters, it is related that Durer had a very dear and lifetime friend, Franz Kingstein. From boyhood they had aspired and studied and worked together. Durer's genius early became manifest, but his friend was a failure as an artist, though for many years he plodded on in hope. One day, when they had both reached middle life, they planned together to make a drawing of our Lord's crucifixion. When they came to show each other what they had accomplished, the p ture of Franz was cold and lifeless, while that Albrecht was full of beauty. Franz himself saw then, and now, in middle life, he knew at last that he h so far failed. Only for one passionate moment buried his face in his hands. Then he said in brok tones:

"Albrecht, the good Lord gave me no such gift this. But he has something yet for me to do. So homely work shall be found for me."

"O Franz, be quiet; do not move for one instant exclaimed Albrecht. And a quick rush was made the paper before him on the table. Only a few lin with a pencil. Franz thought he was adding anoth stroke to his drawing, and waited patiently, leaning ov the mantel, with his fingers twined and clasped.

"Why, these are only my hands," said Fran "where did you get them?" And there was hardly ne of answer; "I took them yesterday, as you stood ma ing the sad surrender of your life, so very, very brave And I murmured to myself, 'Those hands, that ma never paint a picture, may now make one.' I ha faith in those folded hands, my brother-friend; the will go to men hearts in the years to come."

And the prophecy was true, for over the whole arti tic world has gone the tale. And "The Folde Hands," by Albrecht Durer, are but the hands of Fra Kingstein, once folded in brave, sweet resignation, whe he gave up his dearest wish, and yet believed that th good Lord had some lowly duty for him to do that w worth the doing.

So the Lord may thwart your purpose, even whe your very life seems bound up in it; then accept h will submissively, bravely, and you shall be blesse And what matters all the disappointment to us, if onl God gets the glory.

A CRY FROM MACEDONIA

OUR Missionaries in Macedonia, even amid the personal perils, and dangers of the revolution now in progress, are not forgetful of the sufferings endured by the non-combatants. They sympathize deeply with the Christian population there, who are enduring many hardships for the faith—hardships which could be averted by a single profession of Mohammedanism.

It is to the eternal glory of those simple Macedonian peasants, that they give up home, possessions, friends, children and life itself, rather than turn traitors to Christ and his Gospel. Of the thousands who have died in the massacres, or perished from hunger and exposure in the mountains, it is not recorded that a single Macedonian, man or woman, sought to save life or possessions by apostatizing. They met death with the spirit and fortitude of the martyrs.

A petition, from the American missionaries in Macedonia, sets forth the terrible situation in language which cannot be misunderstood. After referring to the state of insurrection in European Turkey, the petition continues:

"In such a conflict great suffering is almost certain to be entailed upon the inhabitants of the districts which are the seat of war. We, the undersigned, know, on absolutely unimpeachable authority, that the suffering among the disturbed districts of European Turkey is already widespread and acute, and is sure to become more so as time passes and winter comes on. Without a canvass of the districts in question, we do not care to make any estimate of the number of people who are houseless, or suffering from lack of food, clothing, medical attendance, etc. We are morally certain, however, that the number runs up into the thousands. In some places they are living on roots and grass, now at the close of harvest. What will they do later? We have the testimony of eye-witnesses that in some places the wounded are lying without medical attendance, and with no remedies or palliatives within reach of their friends.

"Regardless of the question where the responsibility lies, and regardless of the creed or nationality of the sufferers, it seems to us that the condition is one which must compel the sympathy of every humane person—the more so in view of the fact that the greater part of the sufferers are women and little children.

"Hence, we humbly and urgently petition the governments of Great Britain and the United States to take active measures to bring relief to the above mentioned stricken districts, and also to encourage the opening of pupular subscriptions for this object. The Ottoman Government should welcome the offer of such relief for its suffering subjects. The thought of whole districts weltering in blood, without a single doctor or trained nurse to relieve the suffering, is too brutally revolting to be tolerated in this twentieth century."

The appeal is signed by members of the Bnlgarian an Macedonia mission of the American Board of Missions.

Mr. Bond, American Missionary at Monastir, estimate that 9,688 houses have been burned in that vilayet alone rendering 48,400 persons homeless. Many of those person he believes, have been killed; others are scattered, som have fled to Bulgaria. The same is true of Adrinople vilaye Mr. Bond estimates that there are not less than 100,000 per sons in Macedonia without shelter for the winter—absolut beggars, having lost everything they possess.

A letter, which comes to us from a native Christian pas tor in Yambol, Bulgaria, affords a glimpse of the terrible con dition of affairs just across the border, in Macedonia:

"YAMBOL, Bulgaria, Sept. 22.

"The Editor of The Christian Herald:

"DEAR SIR:—Knowing the Christian philanthropy don by you through your paper, I appeal to the Christian peopl of America, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in behalf o more than ten thousand Christian refugees from the district of Lozengrad and Malke Tirnovo, Adrianople vilayet, Tur key, whose homes have been turned into ashes and whos dear ones are slain by the Turk. I saw about seven thousan of them on the Bulgarian frontier, south of Bourgas. Oh what misery! No shelter, no bread, no medical help! We Bulgarians are helping them; but our aid is only a drop, com pared with the sea of misery and need.

"A. HRISTOFF, Pastor."

This pathetic letter from one who has been among the suf ferers, and consequently knows whereof he speaks, should surely not pass unheeded. What Pastor Hristoff states is amply corroborated by reports from many other sources. One cable dispatch says, "The villagers in the Okhrida district are without food, except roots and bark. A party of muleteers, who have arrived at Monastir, report that they found skeletons of children, with grass in their mouths." On the roads leading to Monastir are many bodies of men, women and children, some victims of massacre, but many more of hunger and exposure.

It is hoped that, through the combined influence of Russia and Austria, order may soon be restored, and an end put to this horrible campaign of massacre and devastation. But what shall be done with the thousands of Christian refugees of Macedonia, like those mentioned in the missionaries appeal, and by Mr. Bond, and in Pastor Hristoff's letter? Shall they be allowed to perish while the granaries in free Christian lands are bursting with fullness?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has decided to do what it can in the hope that, by God's blessing and with the co-operation of its readers, it may save some of the unfortunate exiles who are now thronging the Bulgarian border. We have forwarded to Dr. Clarke, American Missionary at Samokov, all contributions sent to us by our readers for this specially urgent work of mercy, with the request that he apply the money toward the relief of the Macedonian refugees.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Macedonian Misery

RUMORS are current that the Macedonian Committee has decided to suspend military operations until spring. The reason assigned is, the hope that Turkey will now cease its process of extermination and will proceed with the reforms it has promised to Austria and Russia. The real reason, however, probably is, that the snowfall on the mountains renders the movement of troops almost impossible. The decision, whatever may have been its motive, has apparently had no influence on Turkey. The work of pillage and murder goes on without ceasing. The Macedonian charge, that in the Monastir district ninety-eight villages had been destroyed, was declared by the friends of Turkey to be a gross exaggeration; but the correspondent of an English journal gives a list of ninety-three such villages, and says that, taking the figures for all Macedonia, the number must be fully one hundred and fifty. It is appalling to read of the suffering of the villagers who succeeded in making their escape. The refugees are eating grass and roots to keep themselves alive; they are suffering intensely also from the cold, and those who were wounded have had no medical attention. The Turks, of course, will do nothing for them, and at present they will not allow anyone else to render them any assistance. The twenty-one American missionaries who have issued an appeal for help to the American and British Governments, tell a deplorable story of sorrow, misery and death. It does seem that the fiendish potentate who is responsible for the outrages, might be compelled by the pressure of other Powers to wage war, if he must wage it, according to modern usage. No one can blame him for killing an insurgent taken with arms in his hands, but when women are subjected to outrageous brutalities, and old men and children and inoffensive citizens are mercilessly massacred, it is time for the Powers to interfere in the name of humanity. There is evidently no relief to be expected from the Sultan's promise of reform. The commission he has appointed in compliance with the demand of the Powers, is composed of men whose record proves them to be utterly unworthy of confidence. The Turk is evidently incorrigible. The measure of his iniquity is fast filling up, and we may be assured that although for reasons of their own, the other European Powers permit him to go on slaying and pillaging, there is One that will eventually inflict on him a rigorous punishment.

Shall I not visit for these things? saith the Lord: shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this (Jer. 5:29).

Railway Spine

Some legal medical experts have given the name of "railway spine" to an affection, for which a litigant in the Supreme Court of Louisiana is claiming damages. He was in a collision on the railroad, and contends that he was so severely hurt that he is unable to move. The company's experts, who have had to do with other cases in which similar claims were made, and in which the plaintiff suddenly and completely recovered after damages had been awarded and paid over, denounced his claim as one of "railway spine," implying that the man had not been injured, but was merely trying to make money by pretense. They said that the plaintiff's troubles were all imaginary, and that he was, in fact, afflicted with no physical ailment. The court, however, gave the plaintiff credit for sincerity, and rather pointedly disposed of this theory as follows: "As it does not appear that he is any more likely to get well in the one case than in the other, and as in neither case is he responsible for his condition, it is not clear that it would make any difference for the purposes of the present claim, whether he is really paralyzed, or is merely laboring under a fixed belief to that effect." The court, it would appear, recognizes the fact that there are nervous injuries which incapacitate a man for movement as effectually as physical injuries. We know that it is so in spiritual matters. Many a man is so convinced of his incapacity to overcome temptation and lead a spiritual life, that he makes no effort to do so, though God's promise to him is sure if he would only avail himself of it.

He giveth power to the faint: and to them that have no might he increaseth strength (Isa. 40:29).

An Electrical Pasture

A strange report has been sent to the State Geologist of Indiana, by a scientific traveler, which he is now investigating. The report, which is corroborated from several independent sources, refers to a certain pasture on a farm near Silver Lake, in Kosciusko county. It lies high and dry, and does not differ in external appearance from other fields on the same farm. But when the hand is laid on the surface a peculiar pulsation is felt, and if it is thrust into the soil a sensation is produced like a mild shock from a galvanic battery. When the soil is struck by a stick or stone, there is a peculiar cracking noise resembling that of the breaking of ice, followed by a sputtering which can be heard several rods away, like the noise that is made when salt is thrown on a hot stove. The pasture affected is about two acres in extent, but the phenomena are less perceptible in some parts of it than in others. The geological solution of these strange phenomena will be awaited with keen interest. They seem to indicate that there must be in some soils a susceptibility to the mysterious electrical force that appears to pervade the whole world. It is so with the divine influence, which to a still greater degree animates the universe. There are some souls that respond to it and reproduce it more readily than others.

The spirit of truth whom the world cannot receive because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you (John 14:17).

An Heir's Dilemma

A young German citizen, who for some months past has been employed as a waiter in a restaurant at Duluth, Minn., has fallen heir to a large estate near Frankenberg, Saxony. He belongs to a noble family, but is practically an outlaw. About three years ago he was an officer in the army, but was noted rather for his jovial qualities than for attention to his duties. His friends, however, had sufficient influence to extricate him from the consequences of his escapades, until one evening after mess, at which he had indulged freely in wine, he committed an indiscretion personally offensive to the Emperor. It was quite certain that nothing he could do, or could be done for him by his friends could avert the imperial wrath, and he realized that an indeterminate term of imprisonment was impending. He accordingly deserted, and succeeded in making his way to America. His flight disgraced his family as much as his original offence, and he was left to his own resources. Having had no business training, he was unable to obtain employment, and at last drifted down to his present occupation as a waiter. The estate, which is now his by inheritance, can be secured only by his going to Germany and fulfilling the legal formalities, but he fears that if he was again on German soil, he would be called to account for his offense, which has been aggravated by desertion. He is therefore in the dilemma of continuing in poverty or of facing severe punishment. How bitterly he must regret his offence and the desertion which it involved. It will probably deprive him of his inheritance. The time is coming when millions will be in like case. The heavenly inheritance that might have been theirs, has been forfeited by the sins which have brought them nothing but misery.

Lest there be any profane as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected (Heb. 12:16).

Prayer Meeting in Deadtown

By Rev. C. H. Yatman.

CHAPTER I.

THE regular weekly prayer meeting in the First Church of Deadtown was altogether a dry affair. "Stale pudding and dried beef," the young men would say on the corner, after the service, when they met to get a whiff of fresh air and iron out the sanctimonious wrinkles from their faces. The church has a membership of 463. The usual attendance on Wednesday nights was about sixty. If rainy, from sixteen to twenty would turn out "to support the Dominie," as they said. It was hard to tell just where the fault lay. Some said the minister was to blame, others declared it was the people.

One day they had a funeral. This was nothing new to Deadtown, but it was new to the First Church folk. Their pastor was very properly laid away to rest. There were tears and flowers and comments, and other things peculiar to Deadtown society. Then came the question of a new clergyman. At last he came. Tall, over six feet, black eyes, brown hair, big ears and feet, angular, good.

The third Wednesday night Mr. Lightheart(that was the minister's name) said: "My friends, I am informed by certain parties that your city takes its name from the condition of spiritual affairs here. I believe they are right, but things must change. I have a notion that the first two letters of Deadtown could find better substitutes for themselves, and will, if we do our part. Elder Brown sitting there tells me there are seven bad things about these social meetings:

"Bad management, bad air, bad light, bad people, bad prayers, bad singing, bad results.

"We are going to have another funeral, to bury either these seven stinking corpses,the church,or me. I am not sure which it will be.

"Mr. Smith, if you please, open the window there by you.

"Mr. Sexton, kindly light every gas-jet in the room.

"While we rise and sing four verses of 282, will those young men favor me by moving the last five rows of chairs to the closet yonder? Those now occupying them will find others here in front. Now, let us all rise and sing."

Some people went home, some went up front; one woman developed a consumptive cough in three minutes from the fresh air. The wife of the president of the gas company took the front chair in the centre aisle. They sang the first verse of the hymn twice to get the right tune, and then sang the rest with melody and joy. Mr. Long was asked to pray briefly. He was directly at the preacher's side. He usually covered every want, sometimes from Adam down, sometimes from Abraham down, sometimes from Christ down to the coming century. He had just got nicely started when his coat was pulled, and a voice whispered "Say amen!" and he said it.

"HE ASKED FAITHFUL WILLIAMS TO LEAD IN PRAYER"

Mr. Wrong came to speak, as was his custom, but before he could get the words out the preacher was ahead of him. "There are certain matters in our city, well known to all citizens, that savor of anything but honesty and truth. Till these things are straightened I wish that no one connected in any way with them shall either speak or pray publicly in these meetings. Let us sing, 'A Charge to Keep I Have.'" They made the room ring.

"It is our intention," said the minister, "to have a point and purpose to these Wednesday night meetings, which, if rightly managed, have in them a greater element of drawing power than the Sabbath preaching services.

"I expect," continued the preacher, "to see the church too small to hold all who desire to come to these gatherings, and I now announce that next week we will have a purpose meeting, the week after a praise service, then a promise meeting, then a zeal service, followed by a testimony meeting, an old folks' service, a children's gathering, a sowers' service, and then a reapers' meeting. After these nine are held I will announce further. Let us have a moment's silent prayer before the benediction."

As the members passed out each one was presented with a little card on which was neatly printed a description and subject of the "Purpose Meeting." Evidently this was the seed sowing for next week's harvest, by one who purposed saving Deadtown from any further spiritual disgrace.

HIS COAT WAS PULLED . . . AND A VOICE WHISPERED, "SAY AMEN"

CHAPTER II.

THE lecture-room of Deadtown's First Church never looked so clean as on the night when they held their wonderful "Purpose Meeting." Evidently the "big" minister, as they now began to call him, had no sympathy with dirt in any form, for soap, brushes, broom and duster had brightened things up till they shone, as one woman said, like a new pin. The big high desk had disappeared; where it had gone not even the sexton knew, though the parsonage girl told Mrs. Hay's cook that the minister had taken to wood chopping for exercise early Thursday morning.

By actual count there were out to prayer meeting 137, counting babies, boys, and all; 125 chairs were in the room, well arranged. When the service opened fifteen more were added.

Everybody wondered how the "Purpose Meeting" would go. Well, it went. I must tell you about it. To begin with, Sally Brown played the piano—that was new. After the opening hymn, when everybody expected the long prayers, Will Smith, with three of his companions from the Choral Union, gathered about the piano and sang a solo and chorus—"Dare to be a Daniel." Then we all read aloud together the Convert's Chapter of the Bible. Each chair had a Bible. The preacher asked us so naturally and nicely, "Please all read," that, before I knew it, I read with the rest. The next thing startled the whole company.

He asked Faithful Williams to lead in prayer. Sl to pray! The modest, quiet, best little woman in t whole parish! Well, she did. I asked her this mor how it came about. She said: "the minister asked n on Sabbath what 'purposes' I had made, and I told hi it was to be 'willing and obedient,' from Isaiah 1: 1 Upon the strength of that, I suppose with some futu intentions, he said: 'You ought always to pray and n to faint,' and I said: 'Yes, of course,' so I had to do it. After her prayer there was another surprise. Eld Crane, who had trouble with the Widow Sayles in son property matters, deliberately got up and said he b lieved he had done a great injustice to one of the flocl who should have received sympathy instead of sourne at his hands, and wanted then and there to ask forgiv ness from all concerned. Mrs. Sayles sobbed aloud and, of course, many cried for joy with her. A te minute song service followed. My, such singing! Th Choral Union men gave the righ pitch and time, and God blesse the music to many hard heart Mr. Lightheart rose, and with a much power and plainness tol of Daniel's purpose not to drin wine, of Paul's purpose to preac the Gospel, of the Prodigal's pu pose to return home, of God' purpose to save all who woul believe, and then modestly name the purposes of his own heart— oh, they were so good!—bearin largely on a shepherd's purpos to feed and care for his flock Then came the open meeting There was but a moment's pause when Will Smith said he pur posed hereafter to use his voic for Jesus, and sitting down at th piano, he sang "Building fo Eternity." That purpose mus have been born of God for a double reason. If Will Smith could do that, everybody could do something, and they did More than thirty spoke. One pur posed to take part in the meet ings; another to live nearer the Cross; a little boy said he was going to read his Bible; Mrs. Johnson, who had never united with the church, said she was going to, at the next commu nion; then a young lady pur posed to teach in the Sunday School; to this purpose the pas tor got six others to join; it made them laugh when Mr. Long said he purposed last week never to make long public prayers.

When Mr. Hunt arose and said he purposed giving up swearing, and asked them to pray for him,there was a thrill over the house. Mr. Lightheart said: "Maybe there are some who will purpose to repent of sin and turn to God this night; if there are such, will they rise and say, 'I will'?" There were five; one an elder's son, two sisters, an old man and a boy. It was nine o'clock, and the meeting closed. The pastor announced there would be two hundred chairs in the room a week hence, hoping they would be full. Again, as they passed out, the little printed card was handed each person, announcing the Praise Service and what it would be.

CHAPTER III.

"GRACIOUS me, the chairs are all taken!" said Mrs. Sims, as she entered the lecture-room of Deadtown Church on the night of the Praise Meeting; and she was ten minutes ahead of time.

The sexton found it necessary to bring out every chair he had, two hundred and sixty-four, with four stools additional. It looked queer to see Elder Bond sitting on one of those backless things, way in the rear of the room, but that was all there was left for him, as he came late.

When Mr. Lightheart, the minister, came in, there was a perceptible look of expectancy on every countenance. His face shone, there was a glad look in his eyes; he had been alone with God. As he spoke his voice trembled, the words came burning hot from his lips. You could see he was more than full. The one hundredth Psalm gave expression to the feelings of his soul. The whole company was set ablaze, and the sons of Scotland never sang that Psalm with more expression than did they.

Together they repeated the Lord's prayer, standing. As they took their seats, the minister's little daughter, led by her mother to the piano, began to sing, "Can Jesus save a little child like me?" and when the chorus came, they both sang, "Oh, yes, yes, yes, He loves me tenderly; He died to save a little child like me"; both voices were perfect in sweetness.

We all felt the presence of Him who loved the children. We became like little children. A stranger asked her to sing the last verse once more. She did. I supposed prayer would then be offered, but 'twas not so.

Mr. Lightheart stepped down to a chair where sat a little ragamuffin, with no shoes, pants out at the knees, face only clean. "Deadtown," said he, as he brought the little child out where all could see, "has hundreds of these who know nothing but want and all of sin. It may be that cause for praise will rise in your minds. Let us give our thanks a golden ring. Search your purses for good-sized pieces, as this little fellow, a half orphan, has seven others like him in the home where his mother barely keeps the wolves of want from the door.

"If she gets the means to clothe them decently, they will all be sent to day and Sabbath-school."

Gold, and silver, and bills, and pennies were tied in a handkerchief, and Faithful Williams, with boy and money, was dispatched to his house.

One thing I liked: there was no counting of the collection. All there was in the alabaster box of ointment broke over the head of "one of the least of these."

As the two went out the door, some one over by the window began to sing, "Cast thy bread upon the waters." All joined in the singing, and among them there were many eyes filled with tears.

"MR. HUNT PURPOSED GIVING UP SWEARING"

"A praise service should have something more than lip power," said Mr. Lightheart, as he thanked them, for their offerings to the poor. "Now let us offer our prayers of thanksgiving for mercies to us. Brother George, let your prayer be for spiritual blessings; Mr. Littell, yours for temporal gifts; Mrs. Gibson, you follow with praise for the gift of Christ and his Gospel, then let there be a moment's silent prayer of praise for special providences, and the Holy Ghost."

There was a goodly number of the Choral Union present, and they sang with a volume and power that all could hear, the words of a most beautiful anthem, Will Smith leading.

"Now," said the pastor, as he rose again to address his audience, "we will hear the praises; but first let those speak who are not here. I have a message in my hand from sister Noble, who has not left her room for thirteen years. She says: 'Tell them I am so glad to be shut in with God, where pain is easy to bear. And she quotes these beautiful lines:

'Shut in with a trio of angels sweet,
With Patience and Grace all pain to meet;
With Faith that can suffer, and stand, and wait
And lean on the promises strong and great.'

"Then I have a letter from Brother Task, who was called to the city. He says: 'Praise God for grace to give thirty-six inches to the yard, sixteen ounces to the pound, and not lie about calico washing.' He little thought I would read it here.

"A mother, whose babe keeps her at home, told me to say she was glad God could make a tired and weary woman patient and full of peace.

"Now let us all sing the Doxology, then speak." There were forty-two who spoke. Even Mr. Clarkson, the mill-owner, testified of the greatness of God, as well as Judge Gardner. Who would have dreamed it? There were praises for salvation, for comforts and health. A ripple went over the audience as John Taylor said he praised God for unexpected blessings — the doctor left a pair of twins that came to his house a fortnight ago.

One fellow praised God for a wide-awake minister, which made the big ears of Mr. Lightheart show more than ever—he is such a modest man. I seems that out of the purpose meeting there came three converts, all of whom testified their praise to God for that meeting. It was a noticeable thing how the minister, in such a nice, easy way, got those to speak who never before took any part. He made it quite natural for them to do it.

Mrs. Tudor spoke last. She had just buried her babe, and amidst tears she thanked God that her first-born was safe with Jesus. The official brethren were asked to remain to see about buying more chairs. The "Promise Meeting" was announced for next week. Then, with silent prayer, the minister dismissed them.

But although service was over, the people lingered, loath to leave the hallowed spot. All at once there was a sobbing voice heard over by the door. Faithful Williams, who had returned, was talking to a young lady whose heart had broken under the influence of the service, and grief for her sins. The minister came down, asked them all to be quiet, and they would have prayer. Before he prayed he asked if there were others who would like to give up sin and serve God.

"THE FARMER HAD GOTS TO CHOPPING WOOD"

Two young men said Yes. Then he prayed. All three were converted.

CHAPTER IV.

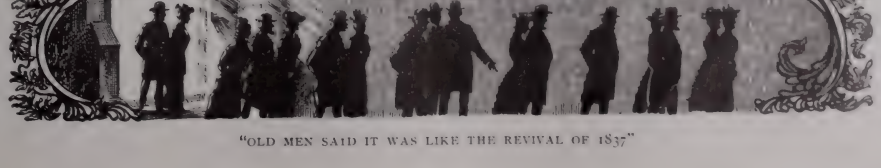
SINCE we last wrote, Deadtown has been shaken to its moral centre. The new building of the Young Men's Christian Association has been dedicated, and the stream of young men who go in and out remind one of the ebb and flow of tides. The Christian young men, full of grace and truth, which gives them a charm because of their hopeful, happy natures, have given the swing of success to the organization, and it's "the thing" to go there. So say the boys, and they know. As a result of this, many of the young men who never before went to church have turned their faces that way. Mr. Lightheart, pastor of the First Church, came in to one of the Gospel meetings and gave a talk. Well, everybody laughed and everybody cried; it was as wholesome as meat for men and milk for babies. He said he wanted to grip every young man's hand, and he did. There was more Gospel in the grasp of his hand than in all the scientific essays ever delivered from the pulpits of America. No wonder that his prayer meetings had to adjourn from the lecture-room to the main audience-room, and then many of the official men had to sit in and around the pulpit.

The night of which we write saw fully eight hundred crowded in the church: two-thirds were young people under thirty. The singing was such as to touch the heart of a Pagan. The Spirit of God took the music and melody, and convinced many of their need of heaven, where they sing forever. Hell has no music; Heaven has it all.

There were, however, no long prayers: the day for them had passed. There were no long faces; even the wrinkles on the brow of weary pilgrims seemed to be ironed out by the permeating joy and peace. Scripture, abundance of it, but given in such a way as to make one relish every verse and want more. Men back by the door arose and spoke with as much freedom as those near the leader. A homelike feeling got hold of everybody, and reminded one of a scene in a large farmhouse where, on a cold winter's night, they all gather around the big open fire.

Mr. Lightheart took the last twenty minutes to tell of Christ and heaven for the saved, Satan and Hell for the lost. Such plain preaching: such grand things for the good; such awful things for the wicked. When he closed, there was a hush like that which often precedes a tempest. Then the storm broke. It was a hurricane of repentance. Men and women, and even children, wept tears of sorrow for their sin.

Nearly one hundred that night stood up and asked that they might be saved. Old men said it was like the revivals of 1837 and 1857. Mr. Lightheart and his faithful workers were calm and earnest. One by one the seekers were led to the Cross, where their load of sin rolled off into a bottomless sepulchre. The hour was late when a circle was formed in the lecture-room by a few who remained to kneel in prayer to thank God for his great salvation. As they passed out I heard one of the town officials, a godly man, say to Mr. Lightheart: "I think, pastor, we had better change the name of our city to Gladtown." There are a thousand cities where Mr. Lightheart is needed, and whom God is ready to do what has already been done in Deadtown.



"OLD MEN SAID IT WAS LIKE THE REVIVAL OF 1837"

The Curse of Unreined Ambition

DAVID AND ABSALOM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 1
SAMUEL 15: 1-12

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT
"HONOR THY FATHER AND THY MOTHER, THAT THY DAYS MAY BE LONG UPON THE LAND WHICH THE LORD THY GOD GIVETH THEE." EX. 20: 12

A STRANGER from the far East, came as a visitor to Jerusalem in this year 984, B. C. The fame of King David had reached our country when he was called the greatest king of our time. He had been reigning thirty-two years, when it occurred to me to journey to Jerusalem, his capital city, and discover, if I could, the secret of his greatness. I persuaded a friend to accompany me. He was learned in astrology, and I had given much attention to literature. We were many weeks on the way with our caravan of camels. We were recognized as strangers when we rode into Jerusalem, but the public eye did not rest long upon us, for it was caught by a gay cavalcade coming up the street, moving toward the Damascus gate. There were fifty heralds, dressed in white and gold, running before what seemed to us to be the equipage of the king. The heralds had gold wands in their hands, and they cried out, "Make way, make way," as they brandished their batons, thus clearing the streets for a golden chariot drawn by several spirited steeds.

We looked for King David in this blaze of glory, but a young man occupied the golden chariot, about thirty years of age, with flowing, wavy, auburn hair, powdered with gold. We knew by report that King David was a man nearly seventy years of age, with snow white hair. "What can this mean?" we asked. "Is not King David still alive?" Our first thought was that he must have died since we left our land, and that we had seen his successor riding in state. "He is not dead," the bystander replied. "But who is this man that puts on such kingly airs?" we asked. "He is the man who wants to be king." "But how impertinent," we replied, "that even while King David lives and reigns, he should make such a show as this. Who is he?" "He is Absalom, the king's son." "A son in name," was my reply, "but an enemy in fact."

After the procession had passed, we wended our way to the inn. As we moved about among the people, we heard opinions expressed on all sides about Absalom's conduct. Many were highly pleased with his grand appearance, and were quite open in their expression of desire that he might be made king in the room of his father, David. The wiser few shook their heads in contempt of a young man who could be so brazen. After a night's rest, we rose early in the morning, and went down to the gate of the city, where we had been told it was King David's wont to go that he might listen to the appeals of people coming to him for counsel from all parts of his kingdom. We thought that perhaps in this custom must lie his strength as king. But what was our surprise to find Absalom at the gate, while David was absent. We watched Absalom's mode of procedure. He fawned upon every one who came, even taking them by the hand and kissing them. We moved nearer that we might hear his words of greeting. He asked first, "Of what city art thou?" And then he desired to know what their difficulties might be, and told each and every one that he had a good case, but that King David had not cared enough about his people to come himself or send anybody to be their judge. "If I were made a judge in this land," said Absalom, "I would see that you had justice."

DAVID RESTRAINS ABISHAI FROM PUNISHING THE ASPERSER

We could plainly see that the king's son was stealing the hearts of the people. And we wondered whether or not King David knew that his enemies were those of his own household. We turned sadly away, remarking how strangely and how suddenly the fame of a great man was becoming dimmed. Our desire to learn the secret of King David's greatness gave way to a desire to learn the cause of his weakness. How could King David have such a son, and why did he not restrain him? We asked these questions of a thoughtful looking man, and were told that the mother of Absalom was the daughter of a heathen king, and that he had been brought up by his mother to fear neither man nor God.

Illustration and Application

A father's sin, though forgiven, reappears in his children. Ambition kills rivals, even though brother and father.

He "loves not wisely but too well" who forgives an unrepentant child.

While honoring parents has the promise of long life, those who dishonor parents hasten their own death, as did Absalom.

The beginning of Absalom's story is a powerful lesson in heredity, and a warning to those who think it a small thing to sin because God is merciful. David's adultery and murder were forgiven; but he was not therefore rid of the consequences of his crimes. His eldest son, Ammon, repeated his father's sin, and that gave Absalom an excuse to murder the only brother that stood between him and the throne. Forgiveness cannot stop the sinful word or deed that our sin has sent out on its deadly errand. Probably one chief reason why David did not deal more severely with Ammon and Absalom, was that his conscience reminded him that they were but repeating his own sins. David never ceased to suffer in his family the consequences of his wrongdoing. Having married a heathen wife it was to be expected she would bear him such a heathen child as Absalom proved to be. Marius was a cutler by trade, and one of the Thirty Tyrants during the reign of Gallienus. He was chosen emperor one day, and reigned the next, and the third was slain by one of his soldiers, who, striking him, said, "This is with a sword which was made by thyself." David was smitten by his own sins in the hands of his sons.

The first blood on Absalom's ambition was that of a brother. As in Absalom's later plots, this act was mixed with deep hypocrisy. He seemed to be an avenger of the dishonor of his sister Tamar by his brother Ammon, but the real reason for this taking the law into his own hands was that Ammon was the only brother older than himself, and he thought by killing him to clear his own path to the throne. Two years Absalom had plotted this fratricide. It was a crime like Macbeth's, the murder of a kinsman and a guest, to secure a crown. As envy killed righteous Abel, ambition killed wicked Ammon.

How like a mounting devil in the heart
Rules the unreined ambition! Let it once
But play the monarch, and its haughty brow
Glows with a beauty that bewilders thought
And unthrones peace forever.

The poet, N. P. Willis, thus speaks of Parrhasius, who racked a slave to death that he might paint such a death with realistic awfulness and so achieve fame for himself at whatever cost. Absalom was willing to sacrifice first his brother, and later his father, to his own ambition.

I'd kill thee, though I knew
A thousand lives were perishing in thine—
What were ten thousand to a fame like mine?

And "ten thousand" Absalom was at last willing to make it by a civil war rather than miss the throne.

To return to the story, Absalom having lynched Ammon, ran away to his heathen father-in-law in Geshur to escape punishment for the murder. David, in his great love for his beautiful but wayward son, consented to allow him to come back unpunished and unrepentant, only he must not come to the king's palace to be treated as a prince. For two years this half exile continued. Then Absalom forced a change. What a glimpse we get of Absalom in the light of Joab's burning barley! Absalom had several times sent for Joab, David's commanding general, and he had not come. Then Absalom "telegraphed" him by setting his barley field on fire. Joab came post-haste and at once secured from David permission for Absalom to come to the palace and receive the kiss of forgiveness. According to Jewish law he should have been killed instead. At once the ingrate son went to slandering his father and stealing the people's hearts as already described, that he might dethrone his father (II. Sam. 15: 2-6). It is a curious illustration of the success of shallow political tricks that the people should have believed Ab lom's words, even when his deeds told an opposite sto Think of an unpunished murderer successfully nomin ing himself as a judge! Fine qualification for a jud ship indeed to decide a case when only one side had be heard! God gives us two ears to hear both sides of eve question. For youth, the one pre-eminent warning of this lesson, suggested by the golden text, is against violation of the co mandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother." One of t best illustrations of this "commandment with promise," the story of George Washington in young manhood, wh about to leave home, for what he conceived to be a roman "life on the ocean," but which his mother knew to be life of deadly moral perils. She pleaded with him to give his plan. At last he yielded to his mother's tears, and she claimed, in substance: "One who so honors his parents, G will surely honor." But for that yielding to his mothe wish and wisdom, the history of this continent might have be different, and his illustrious name might have been unknow

That great giant of intellect, D Johnson, years after his father death, went and stood bareheade for hours in the market-place his native town, because he remem bered that he had refused to obe his father when he sent him the on some errand.

A young man in the north England, joined a gang of hous breakers, helped them to rob h own father's house. Convicte and imprisoned for a term of year when he came out he went to loo for his old home. Strangers we in the house. His father had died of a broken heart. His moth was in a mad-house. "Mother," he said, when he found he "don't you know me? I am your son." But she slapped hi in the face, shrieking, "You are not!" then raving again, ar tearing her hair. He left the building, more dead than aliv and died of utter woe in a few months.

O that youth might realize that in every thought an word and deed they are shaping their characters an destinies. In place of Absalom's selfish ambition, let ou young people cherish high ideals, and then carve them int character.

Chisel in hand stood a sculptor boy,
With his marble block before him,
And his face lit up with a smile of joy,
As an angel dream passed o'er him.
He carved the dream on that shapeless stone,
With many a sharp incision;
With heaven's own light the sculptor shone—
He had caught the angel-vision.

Sculptors of life are we, as we stand,
With our soul uncarved before us,
Waiting the hour, when at God's command,
Our life-dream passes o'er us.
If we carve it then on the yielding stone,
With many a sharp incision,
Its heavenly beauty shall be our own—
Our lives that angel-vision

BISHOP G. W. DOANE.

The Art of Telling a Story

LOVE of a good story is universal. The child at the mother's knee, or cuddling in the father's lap, pleads for a story. Many people proudly claim to care for profound works of philosophy or history, and sometimes they seem a little ashamed of the interest they take in what is merely entertaining fiction, but they are not to blame if their fancy is captivated by a story of life and manners. Nothing is more natural, more inwrought in the tissue of the race.

The art of telling a story, whether to please a child, delight a group of friends around the fire on a winter's night, amuse an after-dinner circle, or fill a three volume novel, is practically the same. A story must have a point. The teller must keep the point in view. A story must have fitness for the occasion. It must suit the people who listen to it, otherwise it might as well not be told. If brought in to illustrate something in a sermon, it must have a manifest relation to the preacher's argument. The successful story-teller, born with a gift, will always far surpass the other who, so to speak, is made by his own effort, for story-telling of the highest order partakes of the creative faculty and is a rarely fine endowment from God.

The successful story-teller does not burden his narrative with too many cumbersome details. He beware of being either too expansive or too exact, and has the merit of omitting superfluous matter. He aims for the climax, and he stops when he gets there.

Socially no one is more popular than he or she who can tell a good story, who remembers the stories that fit the hour, and who is never at a loss when conversation lags, for something bright, witty and pleasant that will help the laggard moment by. Certain clever after-dinner humorists have been, with some reason, suspected of learning their stories by heart, and carrying a stock with them in the mental portfolio, very much as one packs a grip for a journey. There can be no objection to this if anybody does it with the art that conceals art, and if the stories have an air of freshness and spontaneity, and serve the teller's need by evoking the smile or the tear that they are meant to summon.

One has only to note the clumsy, elephantine movement of the story-teller who does not know how, and who is ponderous and heavy as compared with the vivacity and grace of one who knows just when to relate anecdote, incident, or dramatic episode at the appropriate season. Among social accomplishments few surpass this in charm, grace, and the sort of pleasure that lingers agreeably in memory.

And now for a word of caution. In the family circle there is almost always to be found the over-zealous critic who sets the story-teller right in some unimportant or important detail, if the story is told in a different way from the listener's recollection of it. No social awkwardness is more to be deprecated than this. It should be part of the duty felt by every one in the home, as well as in company, to make those around feel at ease and happy. The person who insists upon absolute accuracy as to the time and place of some past and gone episode, which may be of very slight importance, is a person who wraps a wet blanket around the social order. What earthly difference does it make whether Cousin Jane arrived last month by stage or by train? What matter whether Lucinda's gown on a certain occasion was blue or green? Yet the stickler for absolute accuracy invariably breaks in upon a story with some such trifle as this, throwing the story-teller off the track and disturbing the listeners. The cardinal point of good manners is never to interrupt, seldom to furnish a missing word, and never in any instance to make a comment or criticism, or offer a remark which can even by inference make any one present uncomfortable.

When the story-teller has the floor, let others keep silence. One at a time, please. Your story can wait until your friend has finished. Never mind if it must wait until another day. Good stories keep.

Branching out from the familiar talk of the household or of society into the writing of books, everybody knows that there are people who possess the inestimable gift of writing graphic stories. The world welcomes them with joy, loves them, sits at their feet, buys their books, and in one way or another shows how adoringly it cherishes those who have the art of whiling away the time that else must drag.

From Homer to the last new writer whose stories please the public, the story-teller is king among reading folk. Poetry has its magic spell, history has an enchantment of its own; but the tale woven by imagination, diversified by fancy, and with an underlying note of truth to real life, surpasses every form of literary effort.

GROWING OLD TOGETHER

We have shared the spring and summer;—
Now the mellow autumn comes.
And we share life's joys together,
Heeding not though wintry weather,
Sound its soft advancing drums.
We are going home some day
In our Father's house to stay.

About Correspondence

LETTER writing forms a very large part of our social intercourse at present. The use of the typewriter has become so common, that business letters are frequently written with the help of the convenient little machine. This is right for business letters only. Even if one has a typewriter at hand in one's home, and knows how to use it, the old fashioned method of writing with pen and ink in one's own hand, is a better one for letters of friendship and for correspondence of ceremony. For instance, a letter of sympathy to one in bereavement should not be written upon a typewriter, nor should an invitation to a wedding, or any letter of simple private concern, be thus written.

Typewritten letters signify haste, accuracy and dispatch. An air of leisure should pervade a letter of friendship whatever be its occasion. The same objection appears in many cases to the use of the postal card. It is convenient for purposes of business, but should not be used where one has anything to say which is at all of a private nature. Though no one may read it except the recipient, there is something rather public in a written message which has not the protection of an envelope.

The best time to answer a letter is while its contents are fresh in one's mind. It then assumes the manner of a personal touch, and a great deal of one's own individuality unconsciously affects it. Postponing the reply to a letter for a week or two is not a good plan, because in the interval one's interest lessens, and there is little to say, and the letter carries, perhaps, not so much the nature of an answer, as of a task.

Some of the most charming letter writers are women who have no especial literary gift, but who do tell the little homely things of every day life that the absent one desires to hear. When one is away from home there is no slight thing happening there that is too trivial to be told about. A letter should not be stilted nor couched in high flown terms. The more simple, direct, and colloquial it is, the better it answers its purpose.

One should be careful in writing letters, if they are inspired by any extra stress of feeling, not to say what one might repent of in a calmer moment. A letter written under the influence of anger or consternation, should usually be kept by the writer at least twenty four hours, so that if sent, it may go as the expression of a calm, judicial mood, and not as the outcome of wounded feeling. As a rule, angry letters would better never be sent. They may act as escape valves for their writers, but should be destroyed, lest they do harm.

Love letters are supposed to be entirely confidential, yet even in them it is wise to guard against banality or foolish terms of endearment. The lover does not strengthen his epistle to his mistress by too much protestation, and in the lady, an elusive reticence is always an adorable quality, never more so than when she writes a letter to her sweetheart.

The question sometimes arises, whether husbands and wives have a right to open each other's letters. This they must, of course, decide for themselves, but if there is a right which belongs to anyone, it is the right to open and read one's personal letters before any other eye rests upon them, and this rule should be sacredly guarded. I have known families in which letters were not in the least treated as private property, so that any member of a family coming in after an absence, might find the letter lying there and read and commented on by half a dozen persons, before she saw it herself. This shows a beautiful degree of confidence, but all the same it is not quite fair. Everyone, from the grandparent to the little child, should have the pleasure and privilege, as well as the right, to open a personal letter before anyone else sees it.

Ceremonious invitations are usually in the third person. Of this another paper will treat.

The First Start to School

Kindergarten it is, of course, in these days. And the chubby little tot trots off to it very contentedly. Everything in kindergarten is lovely, the games, the songs, the little chairs and tables, the sweetness of "Teacher," the politeness of the little mates. A school where play somehow teaches many good lessons, where little fingers grow deft, and little heads absorb learning unawares, and eyes learn how to see and ears to hear. How fortunate is the child whose first start to school is in the beautiful kindergarten, who is not allowed to grow tired, and who never hears a cross word!

But the mother whose baby has gone to school for the first time, feels a pang. Baby days are over now. From this hour the great world claims her child. Primary school, grammar school, high school, college, business, profession, a career, the climbing steps will lead up and away from home and her.

Yet if she have the secret of real motherhood, she will keep in touch with her boy, and when he is a man he will still keep close to her. The width of seas may separate them, but the mother's boy, when he becomes a man in the midst of the world's battle will still turn, true as the needle to the pole, to the mother who stood in her door and waved her hand at him when he first started off to school.

ing. They come here about the last of May, remain in their huts and tents fishing during the summer, and about the middle of September go back to Archangel and other towns in northern Russia, to stay during the long, cold winter. The women passengers, here as in Norway, spend most of their time knitting. The men play cards, gamble, play the accordeon, sing, and drink the vodka, wherever you travel in Russia. Everybody drinks tea.

Among the other places we visited, were Teriberka, Gavrilova, Schelpina, Triachina, Rinda, Karlovka, Litza and Ponoi, nearly all on the stern red granite coast of Finland.

The White Sea (in Russian, Bieloi More), is some 40,000 square miles in extent. It receives the fresh waters of several large rivers. I found the water less salt than that of the Atlantic Ocean, doubtless on account of the slow evaporation and the great quantity of fresh water continually pouring into it. It has a coast line of 1,000 miles and a depth of 1,133 feet. The climate is so cold that ice begins forming on the shore about the last of August and is not entirely melted until the first of the next July. There are, however, some places where ice and frozen ground are never thawed out. Forty million herring and 75,000 seals are annually taken from White Sea waters. Some there are who still believe the superstitious stories of Holy Point Whirlpool, and also hold to Kircher's theory of a subterranean tunnel, connecting the White Sea whirlpool with the Maelstrom on the coast of Norway, thus accounting for these ship-engulfing wonders of nature, most dangerous at every alternate swinging of the tides, and which have furnished themes for thrilling stories for a thousand years.

Finland is one of the most interesting countries I ever visited. It has an area of 144,000 square miles, only three per cent. of which is arable, and a population of 2,000,000, most of whom live in the southern part. There are no fossils nor coal. Winters are very cold, and my own observation leads me to conclude that crops fail for lack of summer heat. Then comes famine, such as they experienced a year ago. The relief for famine-stricken Finland sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last winter, and Dr. Klopsch's visit, are enthusiastically and gratefully mentioned everywhere I go, especially when the people know I am an American. Extremes of temperature vary 110 degrees Fahrenheit, and sixty per cent. of the days are cloudy. Notwithstanding unfavorable conditions, Finland is healthful. Ninety-eight per cent. of the people are Lutheran, and two per cent. are of the Russo-Greek Catholic Church.

Archangel, the oldest port in Russia, was founded by Ivan the Terrible in 1583, and now the metropolis of the White Sea country and Northern Russia, is one of the greatest lumbering headquarters in the world. It extends seven miles along the east bank of the Dwina River. The magnificent cathedral, great bazaar, marine hospital, soldiers' barracks, house of Peter the Great, government buildings, ten miles of logs and saw mills, are objects of particular interest. Archangel's annual September fair does a business of 16,000,000 rubl From July to September, while the port is open, abou thousand vessels—chiefly British, German, Norweg and Russian—carry on a thriving trade with Archang Railroads, rivers and canals furnish traffic communi tions with Moscow, St. Petersburg, and especially t Volga country. When Moscow was the great c mercial metropolis of Russia, caravans of merchand from the far Orient came to that city, whence they w forwarded by land and river to Archangel, and ther by ship to London. This was one h dred and fifty years before St. Pete burg was founded.

In winter this is the coldest strip of la on earth. A few days of summer are h and mosquitoes are plentiful. The p ple of these Arctic regions—Russia Finns, Lapps, and Norsemen—seem be at work the entire twenty-four hou When do they sleep? Just as the bea of these forests store up fat during summer for hibernation, so these m seem to store up enough sleep duri the winter of night to last them throu the summer of continuous day. In the respects man is only following natu phenomena. Vegetation here, in perp ual sunlight, grows faster than it does New York. Birds fly about, and sing midnight. Flowers whose petals close darkness remain open here. The soci moral, and bodily condition of the peo also improves with the advent of the v nal season. This is well, for during t period of frozen water, the average nati up here is so prone to forget that "clea liness is next to godliness."

Every time I visit Russia, I am more and mo impressed with her boundless resources of timber, fis ries, cattle and grain; her inexhaustible wealth of fo tile land, rich mines, busy factories and increasing co merce; her supreme power of 1,000,000 soldiers, 13 000,000 industrious people and a boundless expanse territory.

I shall return to New York via Moscow, St. Pete burg, Wilna, Warsaw, Berlin and London.

SOULS WON BY SACRED SONG ✳

The Wondrous Power of Gospel Music, as Illustrated at the Bowery Missio

PROBABLY there is no religious institution in the world in which sacred song is more directly instrumental in saving souls than the Bowery Mission. Every night, some forlorn and weary-hearted passerby is attracted within the walls of the Mission by the sound of the great pipe organ, played so effectively by Prof. Victor H. Benke, a Bowery Mission convert of nine years' standing.

Twelve months ago, Ira D. Sankey, the blind evangelist and singer, presented the Mission with several hundred copies of the Big Iow & Main new song book, which contains many of Mr. Benke's compositions, and nothing is more inspiring than to hear the big crowd of men singing these hymns. The Mission Male Quartette, composed of four converts, possessing well-trained voices, sings at the Mission every night when not employed at some church meeting. It is not an uncommon thing to see strong men bow their heads and weep like children, as such plaintive songs as "Home, Sweet Home," or "Where is My Wandering Boy" are sung.

A young man who had left his wife and little one in Nova Scotia, and had become a drunkard and a thief on the Bowery, had his heart touched by the singing of "Lord, I'm Coming Home." He became converted, and in the course of a few weeks was happily restored to his home.

A great giant of a man, made furious by drink, and hovering on the borders of delirium tremens, entered the Mission one night, wild-eyed and desperate, and stood near the door as though transfixed, whilst a lady sang a simple gospel song. "It reminded me of my own daughter," he said, when in the after-meeting he had become partially sobered, and the workers gathered around him and prayed for him.

"Just as I am," sung by Mr. Hunt, one of the Quartette, to Mr. Benke's music, is one of the favorites. A well-known Bowery man, a frequent attendant at the meetings, presented the singer with a cane one morning, and with tears in his eyes, said: "Keep on singing that hymn; I believe it will be my Salvation."

One of the most welcome visitors to the Bowery Mission is Miss Grace Hildebrand, the Gospel Soloist. Several months ago, a lady reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in Illinois, noticing an account of this talented young singer's life and work, wrote to her, asking, on behalf of her invalid's son, who had recently become converted, and who had written a song for Bowery men, whether she would sing the song at the Bowery Mission. This Miss Hildebrand undertook to do. The Rev. Dr. MacArthur was the preacher on the evening on which the song was first sung. It produced a remarkable effect, and the next day Dr. MacArthur received a letter from one of the men who heard it, in which he said that the Doctor "had preached like an apostle and Miss Hildebrand had sung like an angel." The song is entitled "Shall Mother's Prayer Be Heard?" and the author is Mr. W. Carroll Radebaugh, of Mason City, Ill.

SHALL MOTHER'S PRAYER BE HEARD?

Have you wandered far from home and mother's care,
Thankless for her patient toil, and heeding not her pray'r?
Shall the labor and the love bestowed upon her boy
Lie buried in your heart and perish there?

Safe within that city her pure soul has gone to dwell,
Of her radiant beauty, mortal tongue can never tell;
Could it be your wayward life can mar her rest and peace?
Return to God, return, and all is well.

Shall her oft-repeated prayer at last a bles ing prove?
Does your heart respond to mother's a the Saviour's love? [to-nigh
Come believing, come repenting; Oh be sav
And meet your mother in her home abo

Mrs. Bird says of Miss Hildebrand's singin that "she sings as one whose very soul is fire to lift humanity where it may come touch with the Divine."

Work of the Tent "Evangel"

A very large audience greeted Rev. P. Henson, D.D., as he preached the closi sermon on October 1, in the Tent "Evange movement in New York. The number public meetings in the tent during the summ was 100; the number of open-air preachi services, 146; total attendance, 80,000. Hu dreds of requests for prayer were receive There were many conversions. Personal visit 900. The subscriptions from individuals a collections in the tent were $2,590. The to expenses were $3,311.75, leaving a deficit $721.75. It is hoped that this deficit will b secured in the near future.

The tent work has commended itself t large audiences, and great good has bee accomplished. At the closing service, th audience arose en masse, requesting that th work be carried on next season. Rev. G. W McPherson will lead a still larger tent wor during the summer of 1904.

MISSIONARY PROGRESS*

A Survey of the Work in Many Fields During the Past Century

FAR as the heathen world is from what it should have been nineteen centuries after Christ commanded that his Gospel should be preached to all nations, we have reason to rejoice in the progress that has been made during the past century and in the prospects of still greater triumphs. There are now 10,685 missionaries preaching Christ to the heathen, and there are more than 50,000 native converts who are engaged in missionary work among their respective peoples. The number of actual communicants in heathen lands is now fully a million, besides a still larger number who have declared for Christ and are preparing to join the churches. For all this we are devoutly thankful, and still more for the fact that the period of organization and pioneer work is so nearly completed, and there is therefore reason to hope that the rate of progress will now be accelerated. Besides this, there is now a feeling of comradeship and a desire for co-operation among missionaries of different denominations, which augurs well for the work and will prevent duplication of effort and will promote extension in new fields.

The contrast between the situation at the present time and that at the beginning of the nineteenth century, was vividly pointed out by Mr. Eugene Stock at the great New York Conference. He said that in 1800 the work in India was in its infancy; Carey, the pioneer, had only just begun his labors. China was practically closed. Japan had no missionary at all. Africa had been barely touched at the coast, and the whole interior was unexplored. The islands of the South Seas had received a small band of missionaries, who were patiently waiting amid strong hostility and ominous threatening for an opportunity to proclaim the Gospel. The first quarter of the century was one of disappointment for the home churches, which looked eagerly for news of Gospel triumph, but received none. During the second quarter, a clearer idea of the difficulties and obstacles prevailed, and the need of patience was realized. Cheering news came from Moffatt in South Africa, from Duff in India, and John Williams in the South Seas. In the third quarter of the century, China's gates were forced open by war, and the missionaries entered; a footing was made in Japan, and Livingstone had penetrated to the interior of Africa. Seventy-five years of waiting and hard work, and then came the great advance which marked the close of the century.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Reader, Virginia. "In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me. I love the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications, therefore, will I call upon him as long as I live."

Young Reader, Perry Co., Pa. "Many times I have been in dangers and perils, but, by God's guidance, have been spared. He has answered many prayers for me."

Reader, Washington, O. "I know that God does answer prayers. He has answered mine many times."

A Life-boat for a Pulpit

The photograph shows a unique pulpit in the Mariner's Church, San Francisco, Calif. The church, being attended principally by sailors, it seems fitting that the pulpit should be made from an old life-boat, which, having served its time in breasting the waves of the Pacific Ocean, has now found a resting place in this quaint house of God, with its friends the sailor-boys. Some of its former crew attend in this church for Sunday service.

Anthony Comstock Assaulted

Mr. Anthony Comstock, agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, while attempting to arrest a man in New Haven, who had been charged with flagrant violation of the law in sending improper literature through the mails, was assaulted by the accused and severely beaten. Several of Mr. Comstock's ribs were broken, and he will be confined to his home for weeks, in consequence of his injuries. The following letter has been received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the Treasurer of the Society:

Dear Sir.—As Mr. Comstock is ill at home, and confined to his bed from the results of an attack made upon him by a party in New Haven whom he had arrested and who was trying to escape, I beg to acknowledge receipt of your check for $25.25, amount contributed towards the work of this Society, with the request that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD print it. Mr. Comstock is unable to do anything at the present time, and will probably be confined to his home for several weeks, as he has fractured one or two of his ribs, and is suffering intense pain.

Astonished at Our Premiums

A short time since I sent you two dollars for subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the Bible offered as a premium. The Bible has just come to hand, and it surprises me that you would give such a premium. The Bible alone looks as though it would be cheap at two dollars. I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years, and I am unable to understand how you can afford to send such premiums with as good a paper.

A New Potato Receipt

CORN STARCH TALK

By MRS. HELEN ARMSTRONG.

The success of many vegetable dishes depends largely upon the sauce in which these articles are served. A smooth and delicate white sauce will make the plainest of vegetable dishes worthy of interest.

A fine, white sauce is obtained when Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch is used. This brand guarantees a pure and wholesome starch and perfect results when rightly used. Fifty-five years' use has proven its superiority.

The average cook considers a sauce done when it is smooth and thick, but several minutes of actual boiling are necessary for perfection.

For variety in serving potatoes the receipt here given is well worthy of trial, but remember that for the best results it is essential that Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch be used.

POTATOES FINNEGAN.

Make a white sauce by melting two rounding tablespoons of butter, add one rounding tablespoon of Kingsford's Oswego Corn Starch, and when smooth and frothy pour in a scant pint of rich milk. Let this boil several minutes, stirring constantly, and season with salt, pepper and a little onion juice.

Have in readiness a quart of cooked potatoes cut into dice and a cupful of young carrots coarsely chopped; mix these with the sauce while hot, and sprinkle lightly with mixed parsley when ready to serve.

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.
Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper, which creates sensation, and brings to its side many new friends.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. The great audience sits spell-bound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told.

"THERE, don't cry, mother. I'll go into town in the morning and I'm sure Andy will straighten out. He's probably learned a lesson by this time."

"Do you think he will? Do you, Rod?"

"Yes, mother. Don't worry. Go to sleep now."

"Did I wake you, Rod? I sometimes talk in my sleep."

"Well! well! mother," Rod replied evasively. Don't worry. Go to sleep and forget all about Andy."

"I can't forget about him even in my sleep. I dreamt about him to-night. O Rod, do you think he's in danger?" she asked it, trembling all over as she sat up. Rod could see by the dim light her strained face, ghost-like, appealing to him. The sight irritated him, because it stirred a memory of the past he wanted to forget.

"No, mother," he answered roughly. "Lie down and sleep. I tell you I'll go in and see Andy in the morning."

Mrs. Miner lay back submissively and Rod started to go out. At the door he turned, and said with a show of kindness:

"If you feel afraid or ill, call me, mother. I'll leave the door open. Good night."

"Good night, Rod," she said, quietly enough, but the boy thought he could hear her sobbing again as he went back into his room.

In the morning he said nothing about the event of the night, and about ten o'clock he harnessed up and started for Colby.

"Don't worry, mother," he said as he drove away.

"I'll try not to, Rod. But you'll be sure to tell Andy I love him, won't you? Don't be harsh with him, will you, Rod?"

Rod did not answer. He wished afterwards that he had, as at a turn in the section road he saw his mother standing in the doorway still looking at him.

Half way to Colby a part of his harness broke, and it was afternoon before he had succeeded in mending it so as to start on. When within five miles of town he overtook a neighbor, who was stuck in a slough with a load of hay. By the time he had helped him out and had hitched into his own wagon again it was nearly five o'clock. He reached Colby about six, and drove at once to the store where Andy had been employed.

"Is Andrew Miner here?" he asked one of the clerks who was near the door.

"Miner, Miner? Oh, you mean Andy. He hain't been working here for two weeks. The old man fired him because —" the clerk made a movement as if drinking out of a bottle. Rod asked him if he knew where Andy boarded.

"No, I don't. Might try Mrs. Wycoffs."

Rod drove up to Mrs. Wycoffs, but she knew nothing of Andy Miner.

By this time it was getting dark, and Rod drove the horses to a livery stable, foreseeing a possible night in Colby. After getting supper at a restaurant, he started out to find his brother.

It was after seven o'clock, and Rod went at once into Jake's place. There were only a few men in the bar-room, and he passed through into the rear room, where the card tables were. The minute he pushed open the swinging door he saw his brother and Jim Walker playing cards at a table in one corner. He walked over at once and put his hand on Andy's shoulder. The boy looked up, and at the first glance Rod saw that even that early in the evening Andy had been drinking.

"Hello, Rod. Where'd you come from?" he said showing a little confusion.

"Mother sent me," Rod answered briefly. "Come out of here! I want to talk with you."

"Let's finish the game first. We've only just begun. Your deal, Jim."

"No, you don't," Rod said roughly, and he leaned over and put his big hand down on the cards. "You come right out. I want to talk with you, and I don't want to wait. Mother will be anxious about my return. I've got a four hours' drive."

"You leave us alone!" Andrew exclaimed angrily, trying to pull the cards out from under Rod's hand.

Rod's dark face grew darker.

"Andy, you drop that and come out of here, or I'll drag you out by the hair. Jim Walker, I call you a miserable cur for getting my brother into this hole. If it wasn't for Andy on my hands, I'd give you another smashing, same's you got when I caught you trying to brand some of our calves down by Major's creek. No, you don't!" Rod anticipated Walker's movement to get his gun, and with a lightning grasp that did not seem possible in one so ordinarily slow, he seized Walker's wrist and twisted it in a vice-like grip. Half a dozen men entered the room at that moment. Rod let go of Walker and turned to Andy.

"Come out," he said savagely, and Andy did not dare disobey. He rose and went out with Rod, who backed toward the door with his eyes on the wrathful face of Jim Walker.

Out on the street Rod said abruptly: "Have you got a room anywhere?"

"Yes," Andy said, sullenly.

"We'll go to it," Rod said, briefly.

When they were inside the dingy little room in a cheap boarding-house, Rod sat down and faced his brother, who was almost sober now, and whose face showed a mingling of fear, shame and anger.

THE NARROW GATE

"Mother and I got word of your drinking last night. Mother lay awake half the night over it. You've lost your job in the store. What are you doing? Anything?"

"I've got a job in the hotel," Andy said, sullenly.

"Must be a fine job," Rod said with contempt. "You seem to be in Jake Lawson's employ most of the time. How much does he give you?"

"You go——," Andrew swore. Even Rod was startled at the oath. He had never known Andy on the farm to swear, even under great provocation.

He looked more carefully at his brother's face. How swiftly the devil brands his cattle! The boy's face showed already the unmistakable signs of dissipation, the coarsening and roughening of fibre and tissue.

"You are killing mother, Andy," said Rod, in a low tone.

He related in a few words the experience of the night. Andrew seemed moved by it.

"I think mother's mind is affected by all the trouble she has had, Andy." Rod spoke more softly. "She prayed as if she were another woman. The tones of her voice were hard and unfeeling. It made me creep to listen to her. I've had to get her into the house three times from the graves since you went away."

"Mother has never got over that time," Andy spoke thoughtfully.

"No, and do you know, Andy, what makes that such a dreadful experience for mother? It's not only the loss of the children mother grieves over. You were only a little fellow at the time, and we never told you. But as soon as Elizabeth came down, mother feared diphtheria and sent father right into town for a doctor. He never came back until the day after, and then it was too late. The doctor couldn't save them then. And do you know where father was all that time, Andy?" Rod got up, and his rough face twitched nervously under the stress of his passion. "He was in Jake Lawson's place drinking and gambling, while our little sisters were choking to death on the farm and mother was going wild over it. Is it any wonder mother's mind is weak after all that. And the constant loneliness and lack of neighbors and variety to take her thought off the death of the babies and father. And now you go and tug at mother's heart as if you didn't care, and help to make Jake Lawson rich by buying his beer and whisky—the man who sold the stuff that killed father and the children and——"

"Don't! Don't, Rod! I didn't know! I'll quit and behave myself," cried Andy, breaking down and putting his face in his hands, while Rod walked up and down like some wild beast.

"I haven't any faith in you, Andy, and might as well say so." Rod spoke with bitterness as he walked up and down past his brother. "You've got father's blood in you. You'd drink and gamble if you knew mother was going to die the next minute. She told me to tell you that she loved you. You know she does well enough. But you don't love her any. If you did, you wouldn't do as you have been doing."

"I do love her, Rod! I'll quit drinking and playing and behave myself."

"You say you will. Undress and get into bed. I've got to go home to-night or mother will go wild. But I've no faith in your promises. The minute I start for home you'll make a bee line for Jake's place," continued Rod.

"I won't; I tell you I won't," replied Andrew, but he spoke quietly, and immediately obeyed his brother and went to bed. Rod walked moodily up and down.

"I'll tell mother how I found you, and your promise. If you break it, I hope father and the babies will haunt your dreams as long as you live."

He turned to go out, and Andrew said feebly, "Won't you tell mother I am sorry, Rod?"

"I will, if you act sorry for a month," replied Rod. He blew out the light, and went away without any further good night, and immediately hitched up and started for home.

He had been gone about half an hour when Andrew heard a pebble strike his window. He drew the clothes up over his head, and kept still. Another pebble struck the window a little harder. Then a shower of small stones. Still he made no answer. After a moment he heard a step coming up stairs. He remembered the door was not locked, and started up in bed to lock it, but before he could do so it opened, and some one came in.

"Is that you Jim?" he asked.

"Came up to see how you were." Walker struck a match, lighted the lamp and sat down.

"I'm all right," said Andrew, sullenly. "Why can't you let me alone?"

"You left me in the middle of the game. I don't call that square."

"We can finish——"

"To-night," said Walker, coolly. "But it's too cold here. Get up and let's go over to Jake's and have it out. You owe me a game. It's mean to quit when I was losing."

"I can't. It's too late. I've promised Rod—I've promised——"

"Oh, well. You don't need to play more than one game."

"No, I won't do it, Jim. Go away and leave me alone."

In reply, Jim Walker took a whisky bottle out of his pocket, and going over to the little washstand took up a tumbler and poured out a drink. He came back to the table, which was near the bed, and set the glass down. The smell of the liquor began to pervade the little room. Andy's eyes began to glow with an unearthly lustre, and he sat up in bed. Jim tossed off the whisky and poured out some more.

"What makes you keep your room so cold? Have a nip, just to warm you up."

"No," said Andy, but he eyed the liquor greedily.

Walker drank again, and again filled up the glass.

"It was a mean trick to cheat me out of the game, Andy. After all the times I've stood by you, to leave me in the lurch was a mean, dirty trick." He swore, and drank again, setting the glass down on the edge of the table nearest the bed. Then he suddenly got up and walked over to the window and looked out.

"It's a cold night. Looks as if a storm was coming up."

He stood with his back to Andy, but he knew what was happening. Andy had reached out his arm, taken a hasty drink of the whisky, and set the glass down again.

Jim turned around and walked back to the table.

"Andy, do you think it was just the thing to cheat me out of that game?"

"I never cheated!"

"You did. You left before it was through. It would only be fair for you to finish. You needn't play any more if you don't care. If you'll come over to Jake's, I'll set up the drinks."

"We'll just finish the game?" Andy said feebly.

"Yes, that's all. It's not late. Only nine o'clock. Come on, that's a good fellow. Remember how I've pulled you out of a hole many a time."

Andy got up and dressed, and in twenty minutes was seated with Jim Walker at one of the tables in the wine room at Jake's place, his brain reeling, his nerves on fire with whisky, which he had begun to drink recklessly as soon as the cards were served.

The drunkard's luck at chance seemed to favor him. Game after game saw him winner. The stake was not large, but before eleven o'clock Walker had lost all his own money and several small sums he had borrowed of acquaintances.

At last in a spasm of intruding conscience, Andy threw down the cards and declared he would play no more. He swept up his earnings and poured them in his coat pocket, staggering to his feet as he did so. Walker rose with an oath and tried to detain him.

"Play it out! You've no right to quit now!"

A LITTLE OLD MAN*

The Story of a Child, by Pierre Loti, is in truth the story of a little old man. One is reading the thoughts of a philosopher, when suddenly Pierre Loti exclaims: "At this time I was five years old!" There is always an effort to remember that it is a child of whom one reads. A certain wonder takes the place of sympathy. The child, however, is very affectionate, and the author's references to his mother are full of sweetness. There is, for instance, the following passage:

My mother alone is the only person in the world of whom I have the feeling that death cannot separate me. With other human beings, those whom I have loved with all my heart and soul, I have tried to imagine an hereafter, a to-morrow in which there shall be no to-morrow; but no, I cannot. Because of my mother alone have I been able to keep intact the faith of my early days. It still seems to me that when I have finished playing my poor part in life, when I no longer run in the overgrown paths that lead to the unattainable, when I am through amusing humanity with my conceits and my sorrows, I will go there where my mother, who has gone before me, is, and she will receive me; and the smile of serenity that she now wears in my memory will have become one of triumphant realization.

One evening, when not yet twelve years old, little Pierre hears the tolling of a bell; it is the church bell in the village announcing the evening service, and the impression it makes upon him he describes in one of the most beautiful sentences that adorn his book:

Oh! the vesper bell of Echillais, heard in that beautiful garden long ago! Oh! the sound of that bell, a little cracked but still silvery, like the once beautiful voices of very old people, which still retain something of their sweetness. What charm of past times, and half sad meditations of peaceful death were awakened by that music, which spread itself into the limpid darkness of the surrounding country! And we heard the bell chiming for a long time, but its sound reached us fitfully; once while it seemed to be near, and then again it seemed far away, as it obeyed the will of the soft night wind that was stirring. I bethought me of all those who, on their lonely farms, were listening to it; I bethought me, too, of all the unpeopled places round about where it would be heard by no one, and a shudder passed through me at the thought of the near-by forest, where the sweet vibrations of the bell would die.

Greater than Cæsar, a Story of the First Century, by Emma Bates Harvey. Milne, a little manual designed to provide a thorough and rational course in arithmetic for the first three years of a pupil's attendance at school. These three books are just issued by the American Book Co., New York, Cincinnati and Chicago, publishers. All three are excellent typographically, and as to illustrations and subject matter.

The Jones Readers (First, Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth) are the most recent noteworthy publications of an educational character. These books are the work of President L. H. Jones of the Michigan State Normal College, formerly Superintendent of City Schools in Indianapolis, and later in Cleveland. The Readers are exceedingly attractive in binding, quality of illustrations and typographical appearance, and are skilfully graded with a view to the careful development of the student's vocabulary. They are calculated to inspire the youthful mind with heroism, patriotic feeling, manliness, kindness, and every moral sentiment that plays a part in the upbuilding of a lovable character. Grim & Co., Boston, New York, Chicago and London are the publishers.

THE POET KING*

David, a Man of Strong Passions, Noble in His Kingly Qualities, and an Example of Pardon on Contrition

ONE of the strongest, most vigorous of all the Bible characters, is the man who, as soldier, poet and king, won the intense affection of the whole Hebrew people. Long after he was dead the tender love and veneration for their great ruler manifested itself, and kept half the nation faithful to his unworthy successors, simply because they were his descendants. Perfectly frank are his biographers in recounting his faults as well as his virtues, and as a result, we have a life-like portrait of the man, sublime in his piety, grand in his magnanimity, but despicable in his fall. It needs, however, in taking account of his character, not to lose sight of the background of his times, and the peculiar temptations of his position. There have been many in modern times who have made his crimes an excuse for their own. That is always one of the worst consequences of a good man's wrong doing. Those who are ready to follow his example in his sin, are not willing to follow his example in repentance and reformation. But even the evil so unreservedly told in all its repulsive details has served a useful purpose, in encouraging heinous sinners who, but for his history, might have despaired of forgiveness, to go in humiliation and sorrow to seek mercy of Him who forgave David.

Our first introduction to him is as the modest shepherd lad, who had been so free from self-assertion that even his own father overlooked him when the great prophet came to his house. If any distinctions were to be conferred, the elder brothers were deemed most worthy of them, and the ruddy youth, who tended the sheep, was passed over. It needed the prophet eye directed by God himself to recognize the greatness in the youth. Yet when the crisis came, in which the most valiant of Israel quailed, the despised boy alone staked his life on his faith in God's protection. Again he showed his manly intrepidity in his service to the maniac king in spite of the murderous javelin hurled at him. Great, too, in his magnanimous refusal to injure his sleeping enemy. How few of the men who cast reproach on him for his crimes, would have had the self-control to spare the man whose treachery had been so often exhibited, and whose vindictiveness had been so unprovoked! His greatness of character was seen also in his preparations for the building of the Temple. Many men desiring so to honor God and being refused permission, would have shown resentment, but he was above such littleness, and spent time and treasure in rendering his son's task easy. In spite of his faults, he was a man to be admired.

"1900" Washer Company
I have given your washer a fair trial. It is one of the best washers I ever saw. It washed three pairs of men's dirty and greasy overalls and overshirts in ten minutes and washed them clean. My housekeeper says it would have taken her two hours to have washed them the old way. It will wash ten shirts, with collars and cuffs, in seven minutes. It will wash three washes without changing the water, only adding soap suds and about two quarts of hot water after the first wash.

Evil out of his own House Falls Upon David

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE terrible sentence pronounced by God against David, after he had been convicted of his sin through Nathan's message, was: "I will rise up evil against thee out of thine own house" (II. Sam. 12: 11). And the execution of this sentence was not long delayed. First there was Ammon's abominable sin, by which two lives of David's children were ruined, and then came the murder of Ammon, by the hand of his brother Absalom. It was for the penitent David an awful reminder of his own sin. How we can understand those words, "My sin is ever before me!" (Ps. 51: 3). Three of his family had come under the power of sin and death, and utterly did this man of God experience that the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. Absalom had committed murder, and Ammon incest: on two indictments they ought, according to the law, to have suffered death (Deut. 22: 25: 19: 11, 12). But how should David, who was also guilty, execute the law upon his guilty son? Heart and conscience forbade it, equity forbade it; and yet the law of God remained unchanged. Oh, how heavy must this burden have been in the heart of God's servant. No resource could extricate him from the net in which he had become entangled; but he could look up with faith and say: "Mine eyes are ever unto the Lord, and he shall pluck my feet out of the net" (Psalm 25: 15).

David banished Absalom from his presence, but his heart yearned for him. The thought was probably much upon his heart, that if he had never sinned as he had done, Absalom might never have fallen thus. Perhaps he might justify himself in taking the law into his own hands against Ammon, who had broken the law. Joab perceived that the king's heart was towards Absalom, and he contrived to enlist the help of a clever woman so to work upon David that he sent for Absalom to return; and yet he would not see his son, until Absalom compelled Joab to procure for him a meeting with the king, and the king kissed Absalom (II. Sam. 14: 33). In this reconciliation God had no part. David did not enquire of the Lord, but yielded to his own heart's desire to see his son, and to the strong influence of Joab. It was a wrong step, and the consequences were most grievous.

Absalom had never repented of his sin as David had of his: and probably he may have justified himself and regarded himself as being more zealous of the law than was David. David had given occasion to his son to despise him; and it was after his father had sent for him, and he was no longer under his displeasure, that he fomented a revolution against David. "Evil out of thine own house"—it seemed to be always at work.

One sin unrepented of leads to another. Absalom's heart was not broken by his father's kiss, as David's heart had been broken. He at once took upon him the position of a prince of the blood, and assumed a royal bodyguard. Then he began to poison the people against his father, intercepting those who came to the gate of the city—the place of judgment — with their different cases for trial, and told them that their cases were just, but slandered David by saying that there was no man deputed of the king to hear them.

Oh the grief which must have overwhelmed David, when he found that his consideration for his son had opened the door for that ungrateful young man to stir up to rebellion his own people against him! He, when tempted in the time of Saul, would not lift up his hand against the Lord's anointed, and now his own son incited his people to join him in dethroning God's anointed! "Evil out of thine own house!" O how it followed him!

"And the king went forth, and all his household, and with him the Cherethites and the Pelethites," which had followed him from the Philistines; and Ittai the Gittite, who had attached himself to David, and who could not be persuaded to leave him. And all the country wept with a loud voice, and as he went up the Mount of Olives, the king wept, and all the people that were with him "covered every man his head, and they went up weeping as they went" (II Sam 15: 23-30).

The Steele Orphanage

An interesting case came up before the courts in Chattanooga, Tenn., lately. A white girl, named Lilian Jennings, aged twelve, was brought to Chattanooga by church workers, on the order of the County Court of Knox county, and was sent to the orphanage of Mrs. Almira S. Steele in Chattanooga. Mrs. Steele's noble work among the needy children of the South is already known to many readers of this journal. In the present case the child was sent to the Home without solicitation on Mrs. Steele's part, and was taken in by her out of simple charity. Lilian was an adopted child, and, it is alleged, had been so badly treated that the Y. M. C. A. of Knoxville interfered and took her away, with the Court's approval, as already stated. After remaining for a brief period at the Steele orphanage, Lilian was placed with a respectable family in Chattanooga, where she has a good Christian home. Meanwhile, legal measures were taken by interested parties against Mrs. Steele, and for the purpose of restoring the girl Lilian to her former keepers. It was shown, in the evidence produced, that Mrs. Steele's Home was "for needy children—none rejected on account of color," as her pamphlets announce. The result of the proceedings has been the complete vindication of Mrs. Steele. During the trial, many of the leading people of Chattanooga, who have known personally of the excellent work of the orphanage, came out publicly in her behalf.

Home Life in Palestine To-day

QUAINT ceremonies, varied in different lands, but all showing a common origin, mark the Feast which has just been celebrated by the Jews. It is Succoth, or the Feast of Tabernacles, which serves the double purpose of a harvest thanksgiving and a commemoration of the desert experience of their forefathers. The directions for the celebration are found in Exodus 23: 16, and in Leviticus 23: 39-44. There are elaborate rules given for the public service, which, in these days, can have but a symbolical observance in the various synagogues. The peculiar feature of the feast, however, is that which relates to the home life. The Jew was required to erect a booth of the branches of trees, in which he and his family were to partake of the feast, and in which he was to live and sleep. Like other ceremonies this has been modified by the modern Jew to suit the conditions of his present life. There is, however, enough in the observances of orthodox Jews in all lands to indicate the special character and intent of the survival. The central picture of this page is a photograph of a Jewish family observing the feast amid the strange surroundings of Bokhara, in Central Asia.

JEWS CELEBRATING THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES

Though dwelling among people utterly alien to them in manners and customs and religion, the Jew has set up a leafy shelter, as directed in his ancient law, and there surrounded by his family, the feast is eaten and the period commemorated when, led by Moses, the people encamped in the desert. Thus, though nearly 4,000 years have elapsed since the command was given, the pious Jew tells his children that they are living in this strange shelter because God had said: "Ye shall dwell in booths seven days, that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt."

The Christian also cherishes hallowed associations with this feast. When the Temple still stood, the two most impressive ceremonies in connection with the feast were, the sudden illumination of the Temple Courts by the great candelabra, and the drawing of water from Siloam to pour on the altar. Both were ceremonies of great pomp. It was, as he witnessed the former, that Jesus said: "I am the light of the world: he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life" (John 8: 12), and when he saw the water drawn and poured out, "on the last day, that great day of the feast, he stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."

The photograph at the head of this page is of a scene that may be witnessed any morning in the neighborhood of Mount Carmel, the mountain memorable as the scene of Elijah's sacrifice and the failure of the prophets of Baal. The sides of the mountain are singularly fertile. A recent visitor says that "there is still on the mountain a wonderful profusion of flowering and perfumed shrubs—bay, storax, linden, arbutus, and innumerable others, wafting their fragrance in volumes through the air, while the open glades, with flowers of every hue, orchis, cyclamen, tulip, lily are like the garden of Eden run wild. No wonder that to an Israelite it seemed the park of his country; that the tresses of the bride's head should be compared to its woods (Cant. 7: 5); that its verdure should be regarded as the type of national beauty." Once it was covered with olive yards and vineyards, but now the groves are chiefly wild, with coppices of great trees, except near the villages, where there is more cultivation. Most of the work is done by women and girls, who go out to their labor at sunrise and return later with produce in the evening. That this is no new custom but one of antiquity, may be seen by the references in Scripture (see Isa. 27: 11 and Ezek. 29: 6, 8).

Below are three illustrations which show how primitive are the agricultural customs still prevailing in Palestine. The traveler may still see men ploughing with oxen as Elisah saw Elisha when he called him to be his successor (1 Kings 19: 19). Women are still sent to the wells to fill their vessels with water, as Rebekah was sent when Abraham's servant saw her (Gen. 24: 15). Here, too, is a photograph taken recently of a purchase of corn, which recalls our Saviour's words (Luke 6: 38) "Good measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over." In all parts of Palestine the traveler sees spectacles which show how true to life are the allusions of the sacred writers.

SIN—Its Nature, Fruits and Remedy

A Sermon by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

CENTRAL CHURCH, TOPEKA, KANS.

TEXT: ISAIAH 1: 18: "Come now, and let us reason together, saith Jehovah, Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool"

REV. CHAS. M. SHELDON

THE nature of sin: In the first part of the first chapter of Isaiah, the prophet states one of the most fundamental facts concerning the nature of sin. It is something, according to his view, which blights the whole being. It is not like a speck in an apple; it is an evil which extends throughout all the parts. "The whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint; from the sole of the foot even unto the head is no soundness in it." The figure he uses is that of a thoroughly corrupted life. This view of sin is always the Biblical view. In other words, the Bible always treats of sin as a most terrible condition. God is always pictured as having a perfect horror of sin. Man is always pictured as under the dominion of sin—a most frightful condition. In other words, no matter what our modern views of sin may be, softened down as they sometimes are by cynicism, by a neglect of the Biblical conceptions of God, or by a silly and superficial concept of God's great purity and holiness, the Bible view, both Old and New Testament, concerning sin, is the view of one who regards it as the worst enemy of the soul.

It would be difficult to find in any modern writings a more thorough denunciation of sin than can be found in some of the Psalms. Probably no human language has ever been used concerning transgression which approached for a moment the sublimity and awfulness of Isaiah. God speaks in the first chapter to a whole nation gone astray. The denunciation is complete. The overwhelming nature of sin is pictured without any sentimental weakness, without any excuses. The nation is to blame, and wholly so. The ox knows its owner, but Israel does not know Jehovah, and yet Jehovah and his righteousness have been put before the nation all these years. There is, therefore, no excuse for their not knowing, and they have deliberately walked away from God, they have deliberately broken his commandments. They have wilfully substituted for the true worship ceremonies and forms which are hateful to a God who loves justice and righteousness before he loves incense. The picture, therefore, is complete in its view of the devastation of sin on the life of the nation. It is altogether corrupt, diseased, rotten. There is no health in it.

Sin Identical in All Ages

It is not such a far cry from Isaiah and Israel to the United States. Say what we will concerning the progress of the race, and boast as we will concerning the modern or scientific methods, deceive ourselves as we may sometimes concerning the march of human thought, it nevertheless remains true that sin in its nature is identically the same to-day as in the times of Isaiah. It blights and destroys, it corrupts and digs deep the grave of nations and of individuals. It might well be worth asking the question whether if Isaiah were to reappear he might not see as just cause for uttering his denunciation of sin to our nation as to his own. When we read the accounts of the corrupt, debauched municipal life of great cities like Washington, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Chicago, New York—the greatest centres we have of human energy—and read the indictment uttered against them by those who are familiar with the political dishonesty and misrule, we might truly wonder whether anything less terrible or incisive should be uttered against such conditions, especially after two thousand years of Jesus Christ and his teaching; and the one little word which tells the story of national corruption, of greed, of graft, dishonesty, mismanagement, national and commercial selfishness, is this little word sin, and its nature has been unchanged by all the passing of the centuries, by all the growth in science and knowledge. Sometimes it seems as if all that could be said of our beloved country was, "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint."

Disobedience to God is the greatest of all crimes. We send men to jail; we shut them up in penitentiaries; we punish them by depriving them of their liberty, separating them from their families, for what we call crimes against statute law. But every day men and women disobey the commandments of God, they try to thwart his will, they break his day of rest, they tramp up and down his courts playing the hypocrite—things which do not consign them to any walls of brick or steel, but which pillory them in the sight of an offended majestic holiness as greater sinners than many of those who are apprehended by human law and punished according to human statute. The best thing that could happen to this generation would be to feel not simply the stern theological denunciation of one hundred years ago, but to feel burned into the consciousness with soul reality the definition of sin as given by the Bible prophets and by Christ himself. The most dangerous condition which confronts this nation to-day, especially in the unholy and selfish war which is now being carried on between capital and labor, is a condition where neither party realizes to any extent the enormity, the terrible gravity, and mighty seriousness of offending God.

The United States, if it is not already in the condition pictured by Isaiah in the first part of this chapter which we have read, will be in such a condition before long if it does not begin to realize the fact that it is under the dominion of a terrible power which is not satisfied until the whole life is blighted by it. God is a just and righteous being. It is impossible for a soul made in his image to depart wilfully from his commandments in the full blaze of the light of two thousand years of Christ and not lie under the weight of his condemnation. If there is any one thing taught plainly by Isaiah in this terrific chapter, it is the fact that the nation which he so terribly condems is responsible, and sin has wrought out its complete corruption through the wilful and determined disobedience of the people, who could have done better, who knew the truth but did not act upon it.

Worse Than Physical Ill

Let us grow up, and teach our children to grow up, with an awe of sin, with a frightful fear of it, with an abhorrence for it, with a hatred for it. Let us learn to shudder more at the thought of an impure idea or a wrong word or an evil deed, than we would shudder at the approach of a devastating plague or a hostile army or a great physical calamity like the bursting of a volcano or the destruction of a cyclone. It will not hurt our children to train them to fear the devastation of evil. Sin is an enormous thing in its effects, and to minimize it, to laugh over it, to jest about it, to say it makes little difference, is to deny the plain statements of God's word and set up our own little standard or definition of one of the great and unchangeable laws of God's universe.

II. The Fruits of Sin.—The most distinguishing mark of sin in a life is the lack of consciousness on the part of the sinner of his transgression. It would be easy to enumerate the long list of what we call sins. The exaltation of the physical over the spiritual is seen in everyday life in the unmistakable eagerness with which men spend time, money and energy in the pursuit of the things which perish. Very few men of the world consider the spiritual kingdom long enough to give it any place in their daily programme. The sinner regards the man who is giving the larger portion of his time, his money or his strength to the building up of the kingdom of God as a curiosity, or at least as a being living in another world, impracticable or visionary. The gross departures from obedience to physical law are part of the fruit of sin, which grows out of the exaltation of the physical forces in comparison with those of the spiritual. The vast amount of vices, of the coarse yielding to the appetite, all are fruits of sin. The long catalogue of crimes with which we are only too sadly familiar, as recorded in the daily page of the world's tragedy, the endless diversities of falsehood and dishonesty and lack of common honor, the sins of ingratitude and irreverence, of lying, of failure to appreciate goodness, of cynicism and of cruel criticism—all these are the fruits of sin.

Its Benumbing Influence

But over and above all else which marks sin as a terrible thing in its inroads on the soul is what we first mentioned, viz., the indifference with which the very sin itself is finally regarded. This indifference is in almost every case a matter of growth, but it becomes in time the most terrible mark that sin leaves on the character. In time the sinner grows callous to his transgression. Things which once would have caused him the repulsion of horror finally become easy of performance. What once would have caused the cheek to blanch, and the heart to beat, and the blood to mount with shame, is afterwards done not only with indifference, but with a boast or with a sneer.

The sad thing in the picture that Isaiah draws is the fact that Israel does not know her Lord, even in comparison with the ox that does know his master's crib. Israel does not know, does not consider; the nation is unsound and corrupt from head to foot, but in its own mind it is sound and well. Rome was never so proud, never so haughty, never thought so well of herself as just before the Goths and Huns and Vandals swept down upon her to her destruction. The danger point in our own Republic's life to-day lies not so much in the fact that its cities are festering with corruption, and many of its politicians doing things that dishonor the name of our fathers, who gave themselves heart and fortune to the building of this Republic; but the danger point with this nation is the fact that it does not know how wick[ed] some of these things are, does not consider how terrib[le] they are in the sight of God. Any man here to-d[ay] who is complacent in the face of his own wrongdoing[s] living in the most dangerous condition that he will ev[er] know. There is hope for a man when he begins to r[e]alize the enormity of sin, when he is afflicted wi[th] remorse, when he is agonizing over his disobedienc[e] The people who were caught in flagrant sins a[nd] brought to Jesus, did not provoke from his lips an[y] thing like the castigation that fell from his tongue li[ke] scorpion whips on the faces of the astonished and a[g]gered moral class that was oblivious of its wickedne[ss]

Fatal Indifference

It is a dangerous time for a nation when legislator[s] as in many of our States to-day, openly boast of bri[b]ing; when men and women justify their social custo[m] of gambling as it exists in many wealthy circles, notab[ly] in New York, to-day, where men and women play f[or] high stakes, and encourage their children and friends gamble the money which has been in many cases di[s]honestly gotten in the first place, and with all this tre[at] the matter lightly as if it made little difference. Wha[t] ever else sin has wrought among poor wilful humanit[y] this is its greatest work, the deadening and numbin[g] sense which it leaves in time on its victims. It is sai[d] of one who was tortured once upon the wheel by a despo[t] that after the wheel had turned and broken near[ly] every bone in his body he began to laugh, and when h[is] tormenter questioned him concerning his strange co[n]duct, he said, I am laughing because it is out of yo[ur] power to torture me any further. You have broke[n] down my entire nervous system, and I am incapabl[e] any longer of pain. Do your worst, and I shall n[ot] feel it." Something like this poor wretch is the ma[n] who has sinned away his feeling and has come to th[e] point where the fruits of his trangression are repr[e]sented by an appalling indifference to the very cond[i]tion in which he is found. He has no fear in God, th[e] judgment, eternity, or even death, and exists simply fo[r] his own selfish gratification.

This may seem like a terrible picture of any human being's condition here on the earth; yet, this is th[e] work of sin, and its fruits are too manifest to be denied It is well to hear the voice of God speaking to the chi[l]dren of men in agonized entreaty, saying unto them, "Why will ye die, O house of Israel? Arise, and be hold your condition, that it is altogether debased and corrupted." Sin is no trifle in its last analysis. There is something which goes deeper than despair, and sin knows what that is and deals it as its final blow—indif[f]erence, lack of knowledge of itself, the blindness o[f] the one who has

and is truly without God and without hope. This i[s] the final and culminating result of all sin. The out[-]ward effects which we sometimes see, are of very smal[l] moment by the side of the inward result which is lef[t] in the person. I commit an act of transgression, I dis[-]obey some of the plain commands of my Heavenly Father, I wrong some brother man. The act has gone out from me and cannot be recalled. The injury has been dealt, it has caused anger and trouble elsewhere but I myself who have committed the wrong, who have flung my brand in the face of God and my brother, I am the greatest sufferer of all. There are three parties always concerned in every sin: first God, who is outraged by the disobedience of his children; second, some other human being who is touched by the act of transgression, for no sin was ever committed that did not harm some other besides the one who committed it; but third, and greatest of all, the man who sins hurts himself more than he hurts God or his neighbor. For the stroke which he has imparted to the injury of either God or man, may be swiftly healed; but the injury he has done himself, in his own soul, is of longer continuance than the evil he has wrought to God or his neighbor. Let us not fear to emphasize this fruit of sin. The transgression has dulled and deadened the man's own perception of righteousness, and every additional sin committed without repentance adds to the unconsciousness, until, like Israel, he does not know, he does not consider.

III. The Remedy for Sin.—The Bible always gives two views of sin whenever speaking of the remedy. First is man's part, second is God's. Bible teaching is plainly that man must repent, go the other way, sin no more—as Isaiah puts it, "Cease to do evil, learn to do well, judge the fatherless, relieve the oppressed." On the other hand, the remedy for sin is always described as an act of free grace beyond the power of any purchasing relief on the part of the sinner. There is no contradiction between the necessity of action on the part

A GOSPEL YACHT'S MISSION

FOR many years past, the "Floating Church" at the foot of Pike street, East River, New York, has been a landmark well known to seamen. Many thousands have visited the church and heard the Gospel preached there, and its influence upon the lives of those "wanderers of the deep" has been a most beneficent one. This is, however, only a part of the great work which the Episcopal Church conducts among the sailors and canal boatmen in the port of New York.

In order to make the work more effective, it was decided recently to employ as an auxiliary a steam yacht, which should carry the workers out and in among the vessels arriving in port, and among the canallers and others along the water-front. A neat 73-foot steam yacht, The Sentinel, has been purchased for this service, and is now in commission and doing active duty. The Sentinel is under the immediate control of the Floating Church, of which the Rev. A. R. Mansfield is chaplain. Captain Daniels is the yacht's commander, and with Engineer Carl Olsen and a working crew of two or three men, The Sentinel, twice a week, and on Sundays, makes the round of the harbor shipping, distributing books, magazines, periodicals and other good literature among the Jack Tars and canal-boat men wherever it is most needed. Chaplain Mansfield or Mr. Wood, his lay assistant, is in charge of this part of the work on these harbor trips. Big liners and other vessels are hailed through a megaphone, and, if permission be granted, the vessel is boarded, and the chaplain goes among the men, distributing reading matter, and dropping "a word in season" as opportunity arises. If any of the crew happens to be sick, The Sentinel will take the sufferer to some city hospital. Besides, The Sentinel brings mail for the young sea apprentices on some of the foreign ships, and her visits are all the more welcome for that reason. On Sundays, the trips of the yacht are made for the purpose of taking sailors and sea-apprentices to the Floating Church, and back again to their ships. Bishop Potter will shortly dedicate the yacht.

THE GOSPEL BOAT "SENTINEL," AND THE FLOATING CHURCH

The Protestant Episcopal Church Missionary Society for Seamen has as well as stations in New York, viz.: the Floating Church already mentioned; mission and reading room, Pike street; Sailors Haven, Market street; mission and reading room, Counties Slip; Church of the Holy Comforter, foot of W. Houston street; and reading rooms, State street. All these are in the care of active and zealous chaplains and superintendents, who work with a consecrated enthusiasm for the best interests, material and spiritual, for the poor sailors. Rt. Rev. Henry C. Potter, Bishop of New York, is the president of the society, and among its officers are many of the most distinguished names in the Episcopal Church of America, while its lay managers include many men prominent in the business world. J. H. Morrison, 76½ Pine Street, N. Y., is treasurer.

In a recent address before a meeting held in New York under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society for Seamen, Ex-United States Consul J. A. Johnson made this very effective presentation of the debt which the Christian Church owes to the toilers of the sea. He said:

"What we do for the three million of seafaring of our day must be done quickly. Our time for giving and helping is short. They are at port for a week or two at most, their messages have passage but twelve hours, of hardship, suffering and dangers, until death comes to them generally at sea.

"And when the sea is called to give up its dead, its millions of sailors, who have lost their lives in the service of mankind, and we are enquired of as to what we have done to save them, will it be enough to say in answer: 'Am I my brother's keeper?' or shall we not say, rather, 'we have done what we could?'"

In its last annual report, the Church Missionary Society for Seamen gives the following record of work accomplished in the Port Missions of the Society:

Total number of services, 491; total attendance at services, 26,162; baptisms, 44; communicants, 63; burials, 37; marriages, 20; visits at the reading rooms, 215,256; letters written by sailors and seamen in the reading rooms, and received in care of the missions, 16,820; Bibles, Testaments and denominational books distributed, 5,147; visits to ships, boats and boarding houses, 6,050; men shipped, 1,677.

of the man and the absolute forgiving power of God. We wish to cross the ocean; the ship is waiting to carry us, it is fully provided and furnished with the power to do so. This power we did not furnish, and it is absolutely impossible for us to cross the ocean unless we go on some vessel that has already been made. But in order to avail ourselves of this provision, we must do certain things ourselves—purchase our tickets, step on board, act in some way in order to make the means of salvation available so far as we are concerned. The first cry of John the Baptist as we find him preaching in the wilderness is "Repent." The first cry we hear from the first sermon of Jesus as he begins his ministry is this same word "Repent."

The exhortation to repent carries with it a teaching that it is within the power of men to do so. The indifference to sin, which is its largest and most deadly fruit, may be swept away, and in the place of it there may exist a full understanding of the greatness of the transgression. But repentance, meaning by that the turning away from the evil and going in the other direction towards the good, is an act which is coincident with the forgiveness of God. The sinner does not save himself in that sense any more than he crosses the ocean himself. He goes by the way which has been already provided for him, and he is powerless to go in any other way.

A Complete Remedy

There is also this teaching in the Bible concerning the remedy of sin: it is as complete as the effects of sin itself are complete in their devastation. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." The contrast could not be sharper. There is no qualification. There is no limit fixed to the relief afforded by the remedy. It is significant of all Christ's miracles of healing that the people healed of disease were wholly healed, and in his command to the sinner, he would say, "Go thy way, thy faith hath made thee whole." Nothing half way about God's dealings with men. If sin tears down and makes a ruin so that it may be called complete, forgiveness, on the other hand, builds up a complete structure. The old man becomes the new man.

The days and years which a man has spent in a sinful career are gone from his life; but the moment he repents, his future is saved for him. It is a dreadful thing for a human being to lose even one day out of what otherwise might be a period of companionship with the Divine. To live for any moment of time, even for one hour, in the service of sin is a dreadful condition, and when one thinks of whole days, weeks, months, one is appalled at the thought of the wasted influence, the prodigally spent energy, which all belonged to God, given to self. The man who sins by separating himself from a loving Father in Heaven cannot call back that past by the act of repentance. Even the overwhelming forgiveness of God cannot wipe out the fact that the past has been lived. That is not the meaning of sin's remedy; but this much is true, the past is not treasured in God's memory and need not be in the sinner's. It is a thing of the past, and will never be recalled by any act or admonition of the Divine being, and the forgiven sinner has no more right to live remorsefully in that forgiven past than he has to live over that past indeed again. But the exultation of the remedy of sin lies in the fact that what is left of a man's an unobstructed path of glory, an absolute and undeniable friendship, fellowship and companionship with the Divine being. Though he has sinned through the whole catalogue of all the sins we have to-day mentioned, they shall be as white as snow. Though he has walked away from God and despised his commandments, and given no heed to the voice of his entreaty, though he be red as crimson, his soul shall be white like the redeemed saints. Here is no excuse for sin, here is no place where a man can say, "I will sin all I please because God's grace is all-sufficient." Rather it is the place for the soul to walk humbly and with deep reverence and awe in the presence of him whom to disobey is to grieve, considering the wasted hours of a sinful life and the absolute impossibility of making that past other than it has been. But when we turn our faces towards the future, all that is full of the smiling grace of an infinite forgiveness.

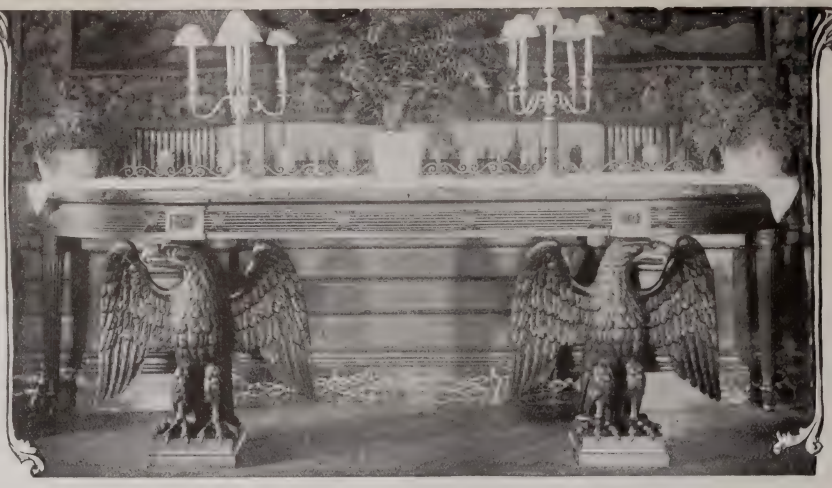
What a wonderful thing it would be if this great Republic could be made to listen for a moment to this cry of the ages: "Cease from evil, learn to do well; repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand:" to be aroused from its indescribable indifference, from its dulled, lethargic, political stupor, which counts out God with an irreverent insolence, which marks sin at its highest with the nation's palpable greed stamped on its commercial life, with the sign of the dollar reared up to cover the sign of the cross, tempting the young and flaunting its so-called advantages before the gray temples of old age. Would that the prophets of this century might proclaim so that the nation might hear, this mighty word, "Repent, turn and live!" Well might it be for this nation to listen to this cry of the prophet uttered many centuries ago, which fits in many ways with the conditions that are true of this very moment. With all our boasted wealth and culture and independence and progress as a nation, we are guilty of so many transgressions, sin has so far blinded us and stupefied us as a Republic, that we do well to heed that old cry, which is the cry of God, always being uttered to a people that is proud and afar off.

A Reasonable Offer

And for any of you here who may have tasted first the bitterness and afterwards the indifference of this thing called sin, this is only one more appeal out of those countless ones made to your life every day to turn from evil and do well, and cast yourselves upon the everlasting mercy of Him who does not reckon up the past, and who will make for you a future full of promise and radiant with eternal hope. "Come now and let us reason together." Over and above all things else thy Divine is reasonable. It is we who have been so foolish that we would not reason with our Father. The sinner is a fool, and he is a fool because he will not reason. But "Come now," saith the Lord, "let us reason together. Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." What more could God do? What more could you ask? "To-day if you hear his voice harden not your heart." "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." It is close by you, my brother, at this moment, if you will only see the great white cross, blackened at the time by the blood of Him who gave his life a ransom for many, but washed by that blood as white as snow, until over all the sinful nations of the world, and in front of every sinning soul of man that ever came into the world, this white cross stands emblem of Divine redemption. "Oh taste and see that the Lord is good. Blessed is every one that trusteth in him." Your part, the part which a man who sins always must do, and leave to God the rest, that which God alone can do. Accept the free salvation he offers. Set your face towards the future; leave the past behind and—even by God himself will do the moment you turn to him—and carry with you in this week's struggle these words which come direct from the heart of a living Redeemer: "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

THE WHITE HOUSE DINING-ROOMS



THE MAGNIFICENT SIDEBOARD IN THE STATE DINING-ROOM
It is a Very Unique Piece of Workmanship, Strong and Decidedly Patriotic in its General Effect

THE vast majority of persons who have visited the White House at Washington, since its recent reconstruction, are quite agreed that, from an artistic standpoint, the remodeled dining-rooms are the most attractive apartments in the Presidential mansion.

There are two of these dining-rooms. Occupying the northwest corner of the building, and looking out upon Pennsylvania Avenue, is the private dining-room, which is used regularly, and upon all ordinary occasions by the Chief Magistrate and his family, and any house guests who may be visiting the Presidential family. In the southwest corner, looking out upon the Potomac River, is what is known as the State Dining-room, which is the scene of the state dinners given at the White House each winter to the members of the Diplomatic corps, the Justices of the Supreme Court, etc., as well as of the complimentary banquets tendered to distinguished visitors, as, for instance, the banquet in honor of Prince Henry of Germany, during his recent visit to this country.

In the recent remodeling of the White House, the State Dining-Room underwent a more extensive reconstruction than any other apartment, and it is virtually a new room, in every particular. The present room is at least two-thirds larger than the former State Dining-Room, which our Presidents long ago had to discard as the scene of their formal banquets, for the reason that it could not accommodate more than fifty persons, whereas, at present the average banquet party at the White House numbers from seventy to ninety guests. In its new guise, the State Dining-Room is a reproduction of an old Saxon hall, with the walls quartered and paneled to the ceiling, in dark oak. The floor is of marqueterie, and there is an immense mantel of light freestone, richly carved. Antique Flemish tapestries decorate the walls, and ranged on the cornice of the room are mounted game heads—trophies of wild animals, which the President has shot.

Fifty-six chairs, upholstered in green tapestry, are provided in this room, with high-backed chairs of more ornamental design for the President and Mrs. Roosevelt. The dining-table is of oak, and ten feet by six feet in size. Of course, this is used only for the less formal dinner parties, for on the occasion of a state banquet, there is constructed a special table, in the form of a crescent or a hollow square.

A feature of the furnishings of the room is found in the serving-tables, which are of mahogany, with the tops supported by American eagles with outstretched wings. These tables, three in number, were made especially for the places they now occupy, in accordance with designs suggested by Mrs. Roosevelt herself.

The private dining-room, in contrast to the State Dining-room, is the least changed of any of the rooms on the main floor of the White House. However, a dome ceiling has replaced the former flat one, and there has been a renewal of the decorations, which are in white. The entire scheme of the room, in furniture and decorations, is Colonial, and lovers of antiques invariably grow enthusiastic over the rare old mahogany pieces with which the apartment is furnished exclusively. In this room hangs the oil portrait of the President, in Rough Rider uniform, by Encke, a German artist. This likeness was placed in the private dining-room, because it is the personal property of the President, and does not belong to the government, as do most of the other portraits in the house.

With the reconstruction of the dining-rooms, and the enlargement of the kitchens, and pantries, and china closets, have come important additions to the White House tableware. The Mistress of the White House now has at her disposal a more complete equipment of table appointments than any of her predecessors. The most important of these new acquisitions is the new china service ordered by Mrs. Roosevelt and only recently completed at the Wedgwood potteries, in England.

There has, of course, been a great accumulation of china at the White House heretofore, since each "First Lady of the Land" has the privilege of ordering a complete new service, should she desire it, and this becomes the property of the government and is not removed from the Executive Mansion at the departure of the incumbent.

The china ordered by the earlier mistresses of the White House has, for the most part, gone the way of all frail treasures; but there yet remain in the capacious china closets goodly portions of the services ordered by Mrs. Lincoln, Mrs. Grant, Mrs. Hayes, and Mrs. Harrison, as well as many odd pieces selected by Mrs. Cleveland, and Mrs. McKinley, neither of whom availed themselves of the opportunity to order a full new service. However, when the President and Mrs. Roosevelt, during the first year of their occupancy of the White House, sought to entertain dinner parties of eighty or ninety persons, it was found necessary to use the remnants of several different china services, and it was therefore determined that the difficulty had best be solved by ordering a new service, of proportions ample for all demands for some years to come.

The choice of the new White House china was made from seventy-eight different and exclusive designs, which were submitted to Mrs. Roosevelt. The one selected is a Colonial pattern, and the entire ornamentation is in gold, save the enameling in color of the Great Seal of the United States on every piece, as the distinctive decorative feature. The new service consists of 1,320 pieces—one hundred and ten dozen.

In order to convey an idea of the proportions of the ornamental design, it may be noted that in the case of the new plates the encircling ornament of white and gold is almost two inches wide. The Great Seal embraces the colors red, white, blue, brown, and yellow.

Although the new china service is of such generous size, many of the famous heirlooms among the historic White House china continue in use. Among these are the quaint fruit baskets ordered by Mrs. Lincoln, and the cake baskets of the "flower set," ornamented in yellow, which was Mrs. Grant's contribution to the White House tableware. Likewise use is still made of the plates ornamented in gold and blue, which were one of Mrs. Cleveland's chief purchases, and the Haviland plates, cups and Unique among the White House china is the set of almond and olive dishes, each bearing the representation, in color, of the flag of some nation. These novelties were originally procured for use at the dinners tendered to the members of the Diplomatic Corps, and each envoy present on such an occasion found at his plate a ceramic reproduction of his nation's flag.

The cut glass service, in use at the White House, numbers six hundred separate pieces, and was specially ordered by the Government for the White House. On every piece, from the mammoth bowls to the tiny saltcellars, is engraved the coat-of-arms of the United States. The original service cost $6,000, and many additions have been made to it from time to time.

The gold and silver plate at the White House, embracing as it does contributions by almost every Administration during the career of the Republic, is much varied in style and design. Some of the pieces have been worn very thin. Almost every piece of plate bears the inscription "President's House." Few of any of the pieces, bear a representation of the Great Seal, such as appears on the china and cut glass, but many of them have the American eagle prominently included in the ornamentation. Among the pieces so adorned are the immense soup tureens, which were rescued from the attic by Mrs. Harrison. These were, by her orders, renovated and repaired, and have since been in constant use at the Executive Mansion. The forks and spoons in use are of very conventional design, but the knives are unique, and one set has gold blades and pearl handles.

WALDON FAWCETT.

THE DESTRUCTIVE OCTOBER FLOODS

THE great and almost unprecedented rainfall which occurred in the first half of October in New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut and several other Eastern States, produced disastrous floods in many localities. Damage to property will reach far into the millions, and includes loss to railroad bridges and culverts, dams swept away, dwellings undermined and ruined and live stock drowned. Passaic and Paterson, N. J., were probably the severest sufferers by the floods. Nearly one-third of Paterson was under water. Bridges collapsed and all railways and trolleys were stopped. The water reached up to the first stories of hundreds of buildings. Factories were silent, being hopelessly flooded. People navigated the streets in boats. The Court House and other public buildings were flooded from leaks in the roofs. Hospitals were emptied, the patients being taken out to avoid the inrush of the rain through roofs, walls and windows. The Passaic river extended far beyond its banks on either side and flooded all the lowlands. At the town of Passaic, the river caused widespread damage. Bridges were swept away; mills were stopped, thousands were made to quit work; schools were closed. The total damage in Passaic alone is estimated at $2,000,000. Nine bridges along the Delaware river, each costing from $50,000 to $100,000, were carried away, and the country for miles was strewn with wreckage of farmhouses, barns and orchards.

This is Paterson's third disastrous visitation within a short period. It has been swept successively before by fire, tornado and flood. By the latest flood 5,000 were temporarily rendered homeless, and the city authorities had to feed and shelter 1,500 persons in public halls and schoolhouses. Mayor Hinchcliffe, of Paterson, declined all offers of help. The loss to property in the city was over $2,000,000. Fortunately, there was comparatively little loss of life by the October inundations, not more than ten, or possibly twelve persons having been reported as victims.

One of the results of the flood and the stoppage of railroads by washouts and broken bridges was a temporary milk famine in New York. Milk being so scarce, owing to the impossibility of transportation, rose to twenty cents a quart. This condition, however, was short lived, for within a few hours after regular travel was resumed on the suburban roads there was an abundant supply of milk in the markets at regular prices.

Reform in Sacred Song

LOVERS of good music—and especially of good hymn music—will welcome the growing movement to bring about a very decided and greatly needed reform in our modern hymnology. There has been a tendency, of late years, to deterioration in the quality of the music that is composed for popular singing in our churches, which is greatly to be regretted. It lacks the dignity, the purity, the sweetness of cadence and grace of movement that characterized the old-time hymns. This musical deterioration has reacted upon the hymn-writers, and as a result, many of the literary compositions that are now set to music are far below the standard, and lack that spiritual quality which ought to be the hall-mark of every good hymn. Some of them verge closely upon doggerel.

We were pleased, therefore, to observe that at a recent gathering of the representatives of one of our leading Protestant denominations, the subject of our decadent hymnology was discussed with the utmost candor. It was the opinion of the speakers as a whole, that reform could not come too soon. Some of the most beautiful of our modern hymns—productions that are full of spiritual power and helpful inspiration—have been utterly ruined by being allied to tunes that befitted the dance-hall rather than God's holy temple. Others were wedded to airs that possessed as little solemnity as a "two-step" or a "breakdown." God's praises were set to the seductive and meretricious measures of the concert hall and the cafe, and not to the pure, wholesome strains that uplift and refresh the wearied spirit, and that express harmoniously and reverently the feelings of the Christian heart.

There is no more excuse for introducing the cheap, clap-trap musical effects of the vaudeville hall into our congregational singing, than there would be for interjecting some glaring irrelevancy in the middle of a sermon. Let us have only the best music and no other, for our houses of worship and our Sunday Schools. As we consecrate to God all that is best and noblest in our lives, so let us render to Him, in our songs of praise, only those strains that are sweet and noble, and that suggest the holiest and loftiest themes. These are the only hymns that can move the soul, and give it a foretaste of angelic harmonies and the glorious music of the redeemed.

The Missionary Spirit

FROM a missionary in far Labrador, there comes to us a letter which carries with it a lesson that might furnish the theme for an eloquent sermon. "Here, hanging on to our anchors," writes Missionary Wilfred T. Grenfell, on the mission steamer, "your letter was delivered to me. On this coast, at every time of year, there is an absolute necessity of having a sure hold on reliable holding ground. Like those of the spiritual life, many of our dangers are hidden. The bad charts are utterly unreliable on the greater portion of the coast, and on the hidden reefs, rather than in the stormy seas, most of our losses occur. Oh, for a reliable chart! And yet how few really value, study and steer by the chart of life. Only two days ago I was called to tow off the rocks a poor wreck. The fault had been her own weak hold, for her chains had been broken and she had parted from her anchor. In her case the holding-ground had been good. It was a very sad affair, it always is, to see so fine a vessel, with all her capacities, lying a dreary wreck. Yet we see them on life's ocean quite unmoved. And many will stretch out no hand to save them. But what a pleasure it was to come alongside in the little mission steamer and be able to shout to them, 'Take hold on that line. We have a power that you have not got. By its assistance we can pull off your ship and take her into safety, though we are only feeble men like yourselves.' The power, we have delegated to us, enables us to do this. And that power we get from coal, the product of wood, the direct storage of past showers of sunshine that come to us straight from heaven.

"A while ago, I was asked to tow a schooner out of a harbor in a gale of wind. We did our best; and the harbor being narrow, we had to make a flying start, and pick up the schooner's line as we passed her. Alas! we had no sooner taken her well in tow, and were going ahead merrily, when her anchor, which she was hastily hoisting, caught some obstruction and brought us both up. We at once fell off before the gale, and had to cut the schooner adrift to save ourselves from a lea shore. We had the mortification of seeing her drive astern, and strike, and then get fast. It was a question of not being able. But we know whom we have trusted, and are persuaded that He is able. Twice I have been able to tow off reefs, vessels that had been wrecked on purpose. Think of it. Think of the man that, for money or for pleasure, would actually doom a fine vessel to destruction. Think of the kind of joy such gains would offer. The few dollars, robbed at the expense of honor, self-respect, at least in one case at the expense of freedom. Compare it with the joy of saving a soul alive.

"Then learn not to pity the missionary. Learn to envy him. And if it involves the loss of king's houses and of fine raiment, why learn what the Master means when he offers us a peace that passes all understanding, which we are well assured that the world can never give, no, nor ever take away."

That is the true missionary spirit! Whether at the poles or the equator, on land or sea, the Christian who is working earnestly and spending himself for Christ is the happiest of men.

Careless in Peril

IS there anything more strange among all the irrationalities of men than their way of blinding themselves to unwelcome certainties and probabilities?

A description of the Philippine Islands tells us that the whole group is of volcanic origin; that one of the greatest active volcanoes in the world is within sight of Manila; that earthquakes are frequent, and so terrible that men's bones are said to shake—they overturn mountains, they fill up valleys, they desolate plains, they open passages from the sea into the interior, and from the lakes into the sea. The earthquakes of Japan are gentle tremors in comparison. Yet the people of these islands are pleasure-loving and easy-going to the last degree. Every village has its band, and at the first scrape of the violin all hands gather in the plaza to dance, only rushing away to witness a cocking-main, for which every town has its pit, and the poorest native of Luzon manages to keep his fighting bird.

In the same spirit of indifference to impending danger the peasants of Italy build their houses and plant their vineyards on the slopes of Vesuvius, and live light-heartedly, ignoring the threatening future, though in the day a thin column of ominous smoke whitens a strip of blue sky, and in the night the dull red of the lava tinges the side of the cone. Some day there must be, any day there may be, an outburst, and gray ashes will cover the vines, and earthquake crack the walls of the houses, and ruin and probably death will fall upon the careless tenants.

What multitudes are just as thoughtless and indifferent in regard to far greater perils—perils more certain to assail us and more disastrous in their destructiveness. Partly because we ignore that which is unwelcome, partly because our sight is mercifully short, partly because we cheat ourselves into believing that we can cope with disaster when it comes, we go on comfortably enough, and seldom think of the "sudden destruction" which any day or any hour may burst upon us.

Alas for those who are "at rest and dwell confidently," unless they can say, "The Lord is my defence, because the Holy One of Israel is my King."

OUR readers will doubtless notice, that in the present number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we are carrying a large amount of advertising. They will also observe that we have added twelve pages to the number for which we stand pledged from week to week. No matter how much advertising THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contains, it never infringes upon the rights of its subscribers. As is the case in this issue, when the advertising is so large as to warrant an addition to the usual number of pages, the quantity of reading matter is increased in proportion.

Religious Cowards

THERE are some few things in my life that I will never quite forgive myself for.

So, with the disciples of Christ, I should think, if their eyesight is long enough to look down from heaven to earth every time they saw a Bible printed, they would like to take out the type where it says, "They all forsook him and fled."

Nice record that! Fine reading for folk who were "chosen." It was bad enough for Thomas to be a doubter for Peter to deny him and Judas to betray him; but for a John and a James and all the rest to turn to and run, oh the shame of it! Religious Cowards!

England was that when she let the Turk murder the Christians and when she left Gordon to perish in Khartoum.

America is all that when she lets the sweat-shops exist and pulls a few gambling houses; when the Monte Carlo of our country, "Wall Street," is permitted to flout and flaunt its "watered stock" and "margin" game to the death of conscience in multitudes.

Religious men in politics are cringing cowards when "party and policy" lead the way in their doings, above deity and truth.

So are rich men who, clothed in the purple and fine linen of to-day's spinning, are single-eyed in their home and private matters, but play the double to the full in their corporations and rob right and left, until an oil lamp, a steel billet, a lump of sugar or a book out of a library makes, by memory and suggestion, the chills creep over one till the soul grows sick.

Preachers who see, week after week, the wicked in their pews and know their lives, but who never preach repentance, nor dream of doing so.

Ah me! We need a revival of religion that will grow moral heroes and civic leaders, who will demand and fight for the life and liberties that belong to a Christian civilization.

My opinion is that we are on the edge of such a God-given work.

Thank heaven we have some men too big and true for trusts and politicians to handle; some who are above and beyond the intrigues of schemers in high places. We have had some who, by the grace of God, grew so fast as to astonish their day and generation till in their death they accomplished more than most men alive.

All of these and hundreds more shame the weaklings. I feel ashamed myself. But Peter had his Pentecost and the runaways with him, and then they never fled. Oh, for his mighty power to come on—not one hundred and twenty, but one million and twenty.

C. H. YATMAN.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, in their recent revival work at Fairbury, Ill., had a total of over 3,200 "seekers" during the entire series of services.

—EVANGELIST B. P. STOUT, of Philadelphia, has lately held a series of very successful meetings at Providence, under the auspices of the Rhode Island Baptist State Convention. Many made confession of saving faith.

—FOR NEARLY twenty-two years W. H. Collinson has conducted evangelistic work in and around New York. For the past three years he has done excellent service with the Gospel car, "Salem," and the Gospel tent, "Good News."

—DURING THE past twelve months, the "Star of Hope Mission" in Duluth has held 42 Sunday afternoon meetings; attendance, 20,776; average nightly attendance, 55; confessed Christ publicly, 555. Mr. and Mrs. Callahan, the conductors, raised in the same period $2,451.07 for expenses.

—G. W. EICHELBERGER, Evangelist, Baltimore, Md., is now conducting a four weeks' meeting at Fort Smith, Ark. During a two weeks' union meeting at Whitewright, Tex., the first week gave over 600 professions of faith and 71 accessions to the churches. At Sullivan, I. T., the meeting closed with 180 professions.

—SUPERINTENDENT S. H. HADLEY, of the Water Street Mission, writes: "I take pleasure in thanking the patrons and readers of your paper for their help in our work down here in Water Street. Ever since I came here—now near eighteen years ago—the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have always remembered the old Jerry McAuley Mission."

—PROF. R. A. TORREY and Singing Evangelist Alexander, in their parting message before setting out on their tour in Great Britain and Ireland, ask the continuous prayers of all God's people for the spiritual success of their work. Their itinerary includes Liverpool, Dundee, Manchester, Birmingham, Dublin, Bristol, and a number of smaller towns, returning to Chicago in June next.

—MISSIONARY J. H. SOBEY writes from San Jose, Costa Rica: "For six months I have been engaged in mission work in Colombia, at Bocas del Toro, where thousands of men are employed on the banana plantations. Our visits were greatly blessed. Held twenty-one services among the men working on the Canal at Culebra. Some professed conversion and some wanderers returned to God."

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

The International Lawsuit

SIX judges, sitting as a court in the Foreign Office in London, have been engaged during the past five weeks in hearing arguments as to the ownership of a tract of 10,000 square miles of land. It is claimed by England, on behalf of Canada, and by the United States, under its deed of purchase of Alaska from Russia. Since 1872 the rival claims have been in contention, and it was finally left to the decision of the court, which has now given judgment in favor of the United States on nearly all the important points at issue. The six judges composing the court were Lord Alverstone, representing Great Britain; Sir Louis Jette and Mr. E. B. Aylsworth, K. C., representing Canada; and Hon. Elihu Root, Mr. Cabot Lodge, and Hon. George Turner, representing the United States. Eminent counsel on both sides were retained, and made elaborate arguments for the contentions of the respective litigants. The illustration on this page shows the scene in court during the hearing of the case. The whole question turned on the definition of the word coast, in the original treaty, which was negotiated between Great Britain and Russia in 1825. By this treaty the coast line south of Alaska, for a distance of about 500 miles, was declared to belong to Russia. The width of this strip is the question in dispute. It was roughly stated in the treaty as the space west of the summit of the mountains running parallel with the coast, and except in cases where the mountains were more than ten leagues from the coast. The contention of Great Britain is that the ten leagues should be measured from the general trend of the coast; while our claim is that the line from which they are measured should be actual coast. There are so many indentations and deep inlets that the difference is important. So long as Alaska belonged to Russia, the question did not arise, but when, in 1867, the United States purchased Alaska, the extent of the purchase became a serious question. It became more serious when gold was discovered in the Klondike, which proved that the strip was more valuable than either Great Britain or Russia supposed it was when the treaty was drawn. Time has been, when the discovery of its wealth would have involved war. That it is now submitted to the decision of a court is a proof that we have entered on a more enlightened era. It is significant that the pioneers in this course are the most prominent Christian nations of the world. They are helping to bring about the time when all such disputes will be so decided, and that by infallible wisdom, as the prophet predicted:

Out of Zion shall go forth the law and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge among many nations, and shall rebuke many people (Isa. 2:3).

A SESSION OF THE COURT TO DECIDE THE ALASKA BOUNDARY QUESTION

Water on Fire

Firemen summoned to fight a fire which broke out in a warehouse in Jersey City, N. J., a few days ago, were embarrassed by a difficulty which seldom occurs at a fire. The water, which a fireman instinctively uses to put out a fire, was precisely the element to feed those peculiar flames. The warehouse was used by the Union Carbide Company us a place of storage. In it were fifteen hundred steel drums, each containing one hundred pounds of calcium carbide. When the fire broke out the firemen were quickly on the scene, but the workmen cautioned them against throwing water on the drums, because if it came in contact with the carbide it would produce acetylene gas. The first firemen who arrived could not understand why they were not allowed to throw water on the fire, but they soon realized the danger of combining water and calcium carbide. The meadows surrounding the warehouse were flooded. As the floor burned away and the drums dropped into the flood, the water boiled furiously and flames shot up from the seething, bubbling mass. The smoke was dense and the air was stifling. There was no resource but to let the fire burn itself out, and the firemen confined their efforts to prevent it spreading to other buildings. We can easily understand the surprise of the firemen, who are accustomed to regard water as the sure extinguisher of fire, at finding that, in dealing with this substance, water actually produced fire. Such anomalies exist in the spiritual world. Some natures are made worse by the Gospel which redeems others.

To the one we are the savor of death unto death; and to the other the savor of life unto life (II. Cor. 2:16).

The Cost of Disobedience

A serious disaster in the tunnel in course of construction, under the North River, between Jersey City and New York, occurred last week, in which one man lost his life and eight others were in imminent danger. It was thus explained by the President of the company of contractors in charge of the work: "In subaqueous tunnel building there is several times a day one special moment of danger. That is when the shield which cuts the tunnel's way through the silt ahead is being forced forward for the foot or so which constitutes a stage of progress, and the doors of the shield are open to let in the half liquid mud which the cutting edges of the shield displace. So long as these doors are open there is danger. At other times the workers in the compressed air chamber at the tunnel's end are protected by a wall of steel, in which there is no break. It is a strict rule in this tunnel, as it is in others of the same character, that the moment the shield has made its way the shield doors shall be slammed shut. It all seems so secure, though, after many days without accident, that the tunnel workers grow careless in the face of danger. That was the case in this instance. The man whose duty it was to close the doors on the instant forgot or neglected to do so." The North River, only twelve feet above the bore, was running swift in flood. Before the men could do anything, there came a rush of mud and water through the six open doors of the shield. One man was thrown down by it and buried. His body is still in there. The eight others barely reached the air-lock in time to save their lives. It was only momentary negligence, but it wrought loss of life and property that could never be undone. People who argue against eternal punishment on the ground that the sins of life are out of proportion to it, forget that the consequences of sin are not measured by the acts of the moment.

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth! (James 3:5).

Rescued by a Dog

Among the accidents by the recent floods was one at Bloomfield, N. J., which came near proving fatal to a son of one of the citizens. The boy in trying to cross a lake, which is usually shallow, slipped and fell in. He did not realize until he found himself struggling in the water, how deep it had become. He could swim a little, and kept himself afloat for a time while he shouted for help. A vagrant yellow dog, said to be a chicken thief, that farmers in the vicinity have been trying to get rid of for a long time, heard the boy and leaped into the water. When the dog got alongside, the boy was almost exhausted. The dog seized his coat-sleeve in its teeth. The boy wrenched his arm loose and then rested it on the dog's back, just enough to keep him afloat. The dog apparently understood perfectly what was wanted of him, as he turned and swam to the shore with the boy. Overjoyed at his rescue, he took the dog home with him and told his story. For the first time in his life the dog received a warm welcome on the farm, and will be adopted as a pet of the family. How glad the boy's parents must be that the efforts to destroy the dog did not succeed. They little thought that they would ever owe their son's life to him. Similar mistakes have been made about the character of men. Those who have been regarded as pests may, by the grace of God, become useful members of society.

He counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry; who was before a blasphemer and a persecutor and injurious (I. Timothy 1:12).

A Tiger-Tamer's Lost Power

Indulgence in intoxicating liquor is responsible for many losses and misfortunes, but it is not generally known that it is liable to impart a man's influence over wild beasts. Mr. Frank Bostock, who is an authority in matters of this nature, relates an example of the fact. He says: "My best trained was an Irishman who had served in a British regiment in India, and who knew the ways of tigers in every detail. He taught three of them to do more work in the arena than I have ever seen done by any other tigers. I have seen him, sitting down between two of them at rest-time during rehearsals, and examining their claws to see if any of them were sore or split. Any one who has ever tried that with even a house cat, knows that it strikes the feline nature as an unwarrantable familiarity, but they never did more than show their teeth and whine, and that half in playfulness. One day the old fellow got very drunk—the first time in his life, to my knowledge. Before he was noticed, he had got into the cage with the tigers and fallen in a heap on the floor. The other keepers made several attempts to take him out of the cage, but it was at once apparent that to do so meant a bitter and serious fight with the tigers. They guarded him all night in his drunken slumber. But the next time he put the tigers to work they balked, and he could neither drive nor persuade them. They had ceased to trust him, and his power over them was at an end for ever." He must have felt humiliated at seeing the animals, who had formerly respected and obeyed him, so changed in their behavior. It was a serious loss to him, because after his ascendency was gone he was useless in the menagerie. That is the consequence of evil doing in other ways. It wrongs the evil-doer himself by destroying his influence in the world.

He that sinneth against me, wrongeth his own soul (Prov. 8:36).

DOWIE'S HOST INVADES NEW YORK

THREE THOUSAND STRONG, THEY CAMP IN THE BIG METROPOLIS, AND CROWD MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

REV John Alexander Dowie, with upwards of three thousand five hundred of his Restoration Host from Zion City, Ill., descended upon New York on October 16, coming in eight trains by several lines of railroad. For many months past, the invasion of the wicked metropolis has been in contemplation by the Zion City Restoration Army. The undertaking was a large one. The General Overseer, as Dr. Dowie is styled, came on the last train, attended by several secretaries. With him were Mrs. Dowie, their son, Alexander Gladstone Dowie, Chief of Police Stern, of Zion City, and Mrs. Stern, Overseers Speicher and Excell, and other leaders. A crowd of 10,000 watched their arrival at the Grand Central Depot. Deacon Francis W. Colton and Evangelist W. B. Kindle, who preceded the main body, had made all necessary arrangements for the reception of the host, and every member was assigned to quarters within easy reach of the Garden; some at hotels and others in furnished lodgings. Dowie, with his family and personal staff, was quartered at the Plaza Hotel. It had been arranged that the host should eat their meals in the Garden twice a day; 1,500 sitting down at each meal, and 300 men and women serving the tables.

ARRIVAL OF A SECTION OF THE "RESTORATION HOST" AT GRAND CENTRAL DEPOT, NEW YORK

They came on eight trains, 3,500 strong. The photograph shows the smart uniform of the Zion City Guards. It also shows some of the Zion women who formed part of the invading army of "The Catholic Church of Zion," as Dowie's organization styles itself. The "Visitation" to New York cost the Zionites $250,000. General Overseer Dowie purposes extending the crusade to other lands at a probable cost of $50,000,000.

At the hotel, Dowie was besieged by visitors. To the reporters he made a brief statement concerning his New York crusade. He came, he said, in obedience to a Divine command, and it was his purpose to do good, and to carry out his plans, heedless of ridicule. He believed in the Bible from cover to cover. He spoke of his long battle in Chicago, and his frequent arrests. He had been arrested, he supposed, a hundred times. But at the last, he had succeeded in establishing the principle he fought for. He spoke in defence of his peculiar doctrines, and announced himself a friend of law and order at all times. Many of the stories that had been circulated broadcast concerning his work and himself, he stamped as fabrications.

OVERSEER JANE DOWIE
Wife of the Founder.

John Alexander Dowie is venerable in appearance. He possesses a native dignity and force in address, and has undoubtedly a certain magnetism which tells with his audiences. His manner is frank and open. His patriarchal beard gives him an aspect of age, which is contradicted by the fresh, ruddy complexion, and the kindly face, lighted up by eyes that twinkle with good humor, or flash with indignation as he talks. He is a native of Scotland, about fifty-six years of age, and in the prime of an active life. Vital force is expressed in his every movement, and he has a rugged and tempestuous, yet earnest style of speech, that is not wholly inharmonious nor unattractive. His genius for organization and administration has been remarkably demonstrated in the success that has attended his Zion City enterprise. His methods have been attacked, his doctrines assailed, and his orthodoxy repeatedly challenged; he has been called both mountebank and charlatan; but amidst all, he has clung to his peculiar creed, and his following has continued to multiply apace.

In the story of Zion City—the centre of the religious movement founded by Mr. Dowie—there is much that reads like a romance. What only a few years ago was little more than a wilderness, is now a really beautiful and populous town, with graded streets and wide boulevards and avenues, fine public parks, a college costing $150,000, Shiloh Tabernacle (in process of building) worth $500,000 and with a seating capacity of 16,000, a mammoth lace factory, and a number of other buildings devoted to various industries. There are hundreds of well-built houses, a doctorless hospital, numerous stores, a group of imposing public buildings, schoolhouses and a bank. All the buildings are substantial. Zion City is, above all else, a clean town. Liquor, tobacco, theatres, gambling dens are unknown. The "social evil" has no foothold.

Immediately after the arrival of Dowie and his host in New York, their active campaign began. Two days were devoted to a literary propaganda, and the first public meeting was held the following Sunday in Madison Square Garden. In the programme for his New York crusade, Dr. Dowie's official announcement was as follows:

Visitation of Elijah the Restorer to the City of New York, from Lord's Day, October 18, 1903, to Lord's Day, November 8, 1903, viz.: Madison Square Garden Auditorium, from Lord's Day, October 18, to Lord's Day, November 1. Carnegie Hall, Tuesday, November 3. Wednesday, November 4, Friday, November 6, and Lord's Day, November 8.

On Sundays, three meetings were on the programme, on Saturdays two, and on all other days of the week three meetings. The evening meetings were devoted to a series of "Restoration Messages." Among the picturesque features of the services, were the white-robed Zion City Choir, the Zion City Band, Zion Guard, Bugle and Drum Corps.

Some of the announced topics of addresses were, "The Risen Christ Knocking at the Door of New York's Millions;" "Repentance;" "The Sin of Idolatry;" "Divine Healing;" "Blaspheming the Name of God." A special address was devoted to an expose of Christian Science, and another to the history of Zion City.

Regarded as a whole, the invasion of the Zion City hosts, the bold and aggressive methods of their leader, the vigorous house-to-house canvass, the great gatherings in the Garden and Carnegie Hall, the 1,800 street-corner meetings, in half a score of languages, and finally the picturesque uniform of the Guards and the thunderous music of the band of some sixty odd pieces and the rattle of the thirty drummers —these have all combined to give to the metropolis a decidedly novel experience. The crusade has attracted widespread attention and given rise to much criticism. Even if it should be productive of nothing else, Dowie's visit will have given our churches a valuable object-lesson in active, energetic personal work that should not be overlooked.

Our Magnificent Premiums for 1903-04

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this year in the matter of Premiums, surpasses all its phenomenal records in the past. As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself, our readers know that during the coming year it will be as far ahead of 1903 as in this year it excels 1902. Progress is our watchword, and present arrangements promise far better for advancement than ever before in the history of this enterprising paper. But we reserve the rehearsal of all the literary and artistic attractions for the coming year for a future issue, and in this we will content ourselves with calling attention to the remarkable Premiums we are now prepared to offer our subscribers.

4. Mr. Morrison's Great Book

Fourth in Order, we mention one of the most charmingly romantic, inspiring, and instructive books of travel ever published. It is Mr. Harry Steele Morrison's latest work, "How I Worked My Way Around the World." Mr. Morrison, when a mere boy, only sixteen years of age, undertook to circle the globe. Of money he had but little—but, determined to live up to his ambition, he engaged as a pantry-boy on one of the great Transatlantic steamers, crossed the sea, and traveled over 50,000 miles, literally working his way around the world. His dauntless pluck secured for him audiences with Mr. Gladstone, Queen Victoria, King Leopold, Pope Leo XIII., Paul Krueger and other notabilities, and finally landed him, a first-cabin passenger, back in the country of his birth, rich in experience and in financial results.

He is now only twenty-two, and in this, his latest book, he tells the complete story of his travels from inception to finish. It is full of anecdote and adventure and finely illustrated. Many a winter evening may be very delightfully spent in its perusal.

"How I Worked My Way Around the World" is superbly printed, beautifully illustrated and exceptionally well bound in rich Vellum de Luxe; with emblematic and very ornamental decoration.

It contains 408 large pages, set from new type in the most modern typographical style, and measures when open 9 x 15 inches. Russell Sage has written the introduction to this remarkably interesting volume.

It is sent, all charges prepaid, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the queen of American weeklies, for one year, at only Two Dollars. Please bear in mind that your money will be refunded if you are not delighted with your purchase, or if your order is received after the supply is exhausted.

5. Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress

Fifth in Order, we offer an unequaled presentation edition of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, exquisitely illustrated and superbly printed on 428 large pages, with a Red Line around each page. The delight of the lowly, this wonderful book has exerted a fascinating power over the most cultured and gifted minds.

This is the most beautiful allegory of human life ever written. It is a triumphant work and not one of gloom and sadness. It is merry and full of sunshine and good cheer. It warms the heart and cheers the soul, and it will be relished as keenly by the aged as by the young. A nobler masterpiece than Pilgrim's Progress was never penned by mortal man.

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, in his eloquent introduction to this superb edition of Pilgrim's Progress, says:

The first book I can remember next to the Bible, is Pilgrim's Progress. It was read aloud to me by my mother on Sunday afternoons, when I was eight years old. The vivid impression made on my mind by that reading, will never be effaced. The characters of the story were as real to me as my own schoolmates. My own father was not more clearly an actual being than Christian, or Faithful. This reality of the allegory has been an abiding one, and it is safe to say that this is one of the characteristics of the story which make it immortal. The characters, the incidents, the outcome, are real in the story, because they are real in actual life. Based, as it is, on Bible teaching and human experience together, Pilgrim's Progress is immortal, as indeed all things are immortal which are true. * * * * *

If this edition of Pilgrim's Progress shall go into the homes of America to be read there, it will not be possible to measure the results on the next generation. A revival of its reading would result in a much-needed revival of the vivid conception of the Christian life, and it is with a prayer that such a revival may result from this special publication of the vision of John Bunyan, that I humbly write these few words and bid the volume Godspeed. CHARLES M. SHELDON.

Very handsomely bound in rich Vellum de Luxe, with emblematic designs and unequaled gold effect, this unusually attractive book makes one of the most Charming Holiday Gifts of the year. The volume measures when open 9 x 15 inches. It weighs nearly three pounds, and is sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, on receipt of only $2.00.

We cannot impress too strongly on our subscribers the desirability of sending in their renewals very early during the month of November. It happens, alas, too frequently, that those who delay sending their subscriptions until the Christmas month meet with disappointment. While it is always our first endeavor to meet the requirements of our present subscribers, who are naturally entitled to preference, we know that this year our premiums are so exceedingly attractive that the demand is sure to be pressing and enormous, and beyond our ability to supply. We want to make as many friends as possible, but we would rather retain an old one than gain a new one, and therefore we urge upon subscribers to make sure of getting their premiums before the rush of new subscriptions exhausts the supply. We always refund the money if the purchase does not give entire satisfaction, and by ordering early you have an opportunity to inspect the goods, and return them if not fully pleased. Oblige us and yourself by ordering promptly.

TEN YEARS' AFTER

THE years had gone very swiftly by since Elmore and Grace were married. They had left their home in the East and gone at once to Elmore's field of labor in South Dakota. The bride took with her to the remote village where her husband's lot was cast an immense fund of enthusiasm and energy, good health, gay spirits and sincere consecration to Christ and his work. She was deeply in love with Elmore Caruthers, and had renounced ease and luxury, and given up a very inviting career that she might become his wife. On his side, the equipment for usefulness was fine. He had been an honor-man at college, and a foot-ball captain as well, carrying off laurels in the class-room and in athletics. There were not a few who declared Elmore Caruthers too good for home missionary work, and who deplored his loss to some conspicuous city pulpit, while they also lamented his carrying so lovely a girl as Grace Deane away from the society she adorned.

The two young people were not disposed to pity themselves when they faced with unflinching courage the discomforts of poverty and the loneliness of a new settlement. Heroes are never self-conscious or self-compassionate. Heroism does not know itself by that name. That one had been a Princeton man, and the other a Vassar woman, helped them when the only books for some square miles were those in their little house, and the only educated man they met was the rough-spoken doctor, who sometimes spent an hour by their fire at night. The discipline of a college training tells for strength and sweetness all through life and its various vicissitudes. And there is wonderful power to sustain when love is reciprocal, and husband and wife are true Christians.

That first Dakota winter, cold, bleak, long, tempestuous, with snow sifting in through the chinks of the frame house, and the nights sometimes so cold that Elmore had to sit up to keep the fire fed with fuel, that burned out like tow in the fierce, windy atmosphere, was full of unprecedented hardships. Letters from home seemed to Grace like messages from another world. She could hardly realize that once, not very long ago, she had belonged to the merry circle in which her girl friends and her sisters moved, that teas, dinners and receptions had been in her ordinary experience, and that she had cared about the cut of a gown and the feathers in a hat. It seemed ages since she had left it all behind her. There was plenty for her to do, it being impossible to secure any help in the housework, and Mrs. Caruthers doing it herself, as other women in the place did. She taught the little Sunday School, aided in her husband's prayer-meetings and in church, where she led the singing, and was in every way his helpmate till spring. One May day, the baby came, and then the little Dakota parsonage was hardly big enough to contain the overflowing joy of the two happy hearts.

Another year and baby's sister arrived. Two little ones, a twelvemonth apart, kept the mother busy. Ten years after the wedding day, the Caruthers had five children. They were struggling along on a very small salary, and Grace suddenly realized that she was tired out, tired mentally, spiritually and physically.

"Elmore," she said, "I'm going home. It seems mean to leave you, even for three months, but I'm starving, and I must save some of my power of assimilation, or you'll have no wife, and the children no mother."

"I ought not to have brought you to such a lot, Grace."

"Nonsense. It has been all sweetness; I love the people and the place, and you know I love you. But I must go for awhile, nevertheless. I wish you could. Mother has sent me enough, and a box from home will be here before long."

"Not a church box?"

"Oh, no; a mother-box, Elmore. There'll be all I need to make the children fit to appear at church in Connecticut."

When the box arrived, Grace's expectations were justified. Her mother had forgotten nothing. The children were equipped with most comfortable clothing, the mother had a traveling dress and a black silk gown, and for Mr. Caruthers there was a thick overcoat, and what he prized more, a package of the newest books.

Ten years had made so little difference to those at home, that Grace felt as if the clock of time had been standing still. Her unmarried sister did not look a day older. The women whom she had left girls were comely, graceful matrons. Everywhere she saw tokens of plenty, of the greatest homely comfort.

She revelled in it all. She went to everything, concerts, lectures, whatever there was that was by way of recreation. Every luncheon and dinner was a delight to her, and she grew young before their eyes, in her vivid enjoyment. When her mother suggested her leaving the two elder children to attend school in the East, her eager assent showed that she appreciated at once the advantage a home training in the old haunts would be to them.

But the three months slipped away. One morning Grace went home. Rested, refreshed, joyous in renewed health, she took up the old life, and was again her husband's helpful comrade.

Every one has not Grace Caruthers' home to return to. But most of us, if resolute, can find some place, perhaps only a few miles away, where for a little while we may draw a free breath, and forget our cares.

BABY IN THE CRADLE

Baby in the cradle,
Sleeping, oh! so sweetly,
Little hands and little feet,
Formed, oh! completely.

Mother's joy and comfort,
Little cradle king,
Never was another child
Half so fair a thing.

LONELY DAYS

A FEW days ago, a very aged man stood in a home fro whence a friend of his youth had just passed into th heavenly land. With a faltering voice, he said: "M last friend has gone." I wonder if younger people apprecia how lonely the world grows to the old as their contemporarie one by one, pass away, and they are left standing in the fro rank, with the billows of eternity breaking on the shore at the feet? Perhaps we would be more patient and considerate old people if it ever occurred to us that once they were youn that they once stood in the thick of life's conflict with amb tions, interests and occupations as absorbing as our own; th once friends and kindred surrounded the closely, and that life before them beckone with as bright and eager a face as li beckons to their juniors now. It is n wonder that the old resent the pushin and sometimes indelicate haste of tho who are younger to snatch at the dutie which their hands still hold. It is all we meant, the kindness of younger peopl but it is often very futile and a great mi take. The grandparents are jealous giving up the tasks which they have a ways carried on, and all the more so, th around them are so few of those who b gan life's journey when they did. Th days grow lonely. Very many once her have passed away, and none have take their places. Age does well to gathe about it youth and young people. So d ing it may wave defiance in the face desolation, even as the red leaves of th autumn shake their colors bravely in th face of the on-coming winter.

So long as they can, old people shoul hold fast to their own sceptre. It i usually a mistake for the mother, thoug feeble, to resign her housekeeping care entirely into the hands of a daughter, no is it wise for the father to retire fro business too soon, leaving affairs in th management of his sons. The days ma be lonely, but they will be less so to th occupied than to the idle, and so long a strength lasts, it is well to keep occupied.

Happy is the man or the woman wh dies in harness. Yet death itself hesitate to attack one whom life is claiming in thousand useful activities. This is no made as an arbitrary statement, for every one knows that men are carried off in th midst of their years, when this is God's will. But people do live longer and are much more contented who continue in their accustomed routine. No one is quite so much like a fish out of water as the man who, retiring from business in late middle life, suddenly invests himself with a panoply of old age. Such a man either meddles with the housekeeping till his wife is half distracted, or becomes atrophied and prematurely old. Lonely days must be deferred by all who wish to do for God a full day's work and hear His "well done" at last.

A Useful Life

A paragraph in a Wilmington, Delaware, paper, the other day, epitomized in a few sentences a long and useful life. Miss Anna H. Maxwell had taught fifty-seven consecutive years, fifty-two of them in the Middletown public schools. Three generations of Delawareans stood around her coffin and honored her memory. No words can fitly tell how much good was accomplished by that quiet, sincere, unobtrusive woman, impressing herself, from youth to age, on the minds of her pupils. She was a Christian woman, and her influence for good on the community cannot be overestimated. More than a half century spent in the school-room! Think of it, and praise God for a good woman's splendid record.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—JANIE. Don't undertake tasks beyond your strength. At least don't do so knowingly.

—MADGE. Except in large cities, where wealthy people live, there is little call for a visiting housekeeper's services.

—CHARLOTTE. Praying for one's absent friends is the best way to help them, for it asks God, who is able, to have them in his care.

—ELLEN. Crossness in the morning at breakfast is no more excusable than crossness later in the day. It is rather worse indeed. It starts the day badly.

—MARY. Why do you go to expense that you cannot afford about your wedding announcements? A line or two in the daily papers will sufficiently notify your friends.

Tragic Scenes in Chinese Relief Work

SSUING RICE IN LARGE QUANTITIES TO SUFFERERS

40,000 Hungry Chinese Clamor for Relief—Twenty-three Persons Crushed to Death in the Crowd —The Famine Now Ended : :

METHOD OF ISSUING RICE IN SMALL QUANTITIES

FROM the province of Kwang-si, China, comes the news that the great famine is at an end. Many thousands of lives were saved by the three relief expeditions from Canton, organized by U. . Consul General McWade, and which conveyed large argoes of food to the starving Chinese. These carloes were largely supplied by the relief fund contributed y the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. By the ame mail comes the intelligence of a sad disaster at Kwai-peng, in the heart of the famine districts. A great ultitude of starving natives, estimated at 40,000, assembled at the distribution, and formed a monster crowd hat could not be controlled. In the jam twenty-three ersons were crushed to death, five of them being inants carried by their mothers. This deplorable occurence is recorded with sorrow by the missionaries, who, owever, were powerless to avoid it.

U. S. Consul-General McWade, writing from Canton, China, August 24, to Francis B. Loomis, Assistant ecretary of State, Washington, D. C., concerning the amine, encloses reports from the Rev. Dr. Shumaker, f the United Brethren in Christ Mission; the Rev. ohn E. Fee, of the Christian Missionary Alliance, and rofessor Clancey M. Lewis, of the Christian College f Macao. Dr. Shumaker's report is a supplemental ne, and covers his excellent work during the second merican Relief xpedition. Photoraphs accompany is report, some of hich are reproduced in this issue f THE CHRISTIAN ERALD. Rev. Mr. ee's report is a ummary of the ork done by him nd his colleagues n Wuchow and its icinity.

"Professor Lews' report," writes onsul-General cWade, "tells the tory of the third merican Expedion. The photoraphs show the argo junks loaded ith rice, and ready o start from Canon on the last merican Relief xpedition."

Mr. Shumaker's eport says:

I am able to state he number of towns benefited by famine relief work from hese centres: Tseung-Tsun, 15 towns; Ping-Nam, 35 towns, nd Kwai-Peng, 133 towns. The 6,000 piculs of rice comrising the second expedition reached suffering ones in nearly hree hundred towns, and it must ever remain a source of atisfaction that so much misery has been alleviated.

Rev. Mr. Fee writes from Wuchow:

The Kwang-si famine is now over. Towards spring of his year, as few had seed grain, there was no help for them ut in disposing of cattle, bedding, clothing, household articles and utensils, farm implements, and even the titles of he roofs and then the bricks from the walls. But those who bought would not give much for these things, so there was little realized from the sales. Though not first to be sold, the little children, and especially girls, were soon brought out into the market towns and to the streets of the cities and offered for sale. Sometimes whole rows of women and children were seen lined up for inspection and awaiting the highest bidder. Not only did parents sell children and husbands wives, but some women, whose husbands were unable to provide food for them and were not willing to sell them, ran away and offered themselves for sale, or even gave themselves away to save their own lives. Under such circumstances, it is no wonder that the province has been in a disturbed condition, and that outsiders who know not the real facts, should speak of rebellion. What was needed was not soldiers to slay and butcher, but rice, and had this been done and more generally provided, there would have been little, or at least much less, to say about rebels.

Early in March we began giving relief in a quiet way, but little realizing that the need was so great or the famine so severe. Once a little was given the news soon spread, and before long hundreds of starving people—some mere skeletons, others with limbs and faces swollen from starvation—were gathered around us waiting for food. From tens, the numbers increased to hundreds, from hundreds to thousands and even to tens of thousands before the work became heavier; and there were so few to help, we gave only two days out of three and later only one day in three, allowing about five ounces of rice per day for each person, but to the more needy, larger portions were given, if we had sufficient rice provided. The distribution was made at first from private funds, but as the people came in larger numbers, this could not last long, so friends in our mission, and a little later of other missions, and the foreign residents of Wuchow, Tak-Hing, Canton, Hongkong and Amoy began to send contributions. We thank you for the gifts sent at this time and the interest shown.

When H. E., the Governor of Hongkong, formed a committee and took such prompt action and sent relief as soon as the matter was brought to his notice, and later your Honor had a reply from the homeland [THE CHRISTIAN HERALD], sending aid to the perishing people, not only was relief given to tens of thousands of people around Kwai-Peng, but other relief centres were opened from Ping-Nam to Nanning. As a result of these efforts tens of thousands of lives have been saved, many saved from the pangs of hunger, and a more kindly spirit toward the foreigners has been fostered, especially those who have helped them. No doubt missionary interests will be helped, and we trust the results may be far-reaching.

Prof. Clancey M. Lewis, of the Macao College, writes Consul General McWade, giving a full account of the Third Relief Expedition. After reviewing the work he says:

There were eight rice boats, conveying 6,000 piculs of rice, and each boat was towed by a launch or government gunboat. Each launch and each rice boat carried banners, which displayed in Chinese characters something to this effect, "The Great Republic of America sends Relief to the Poor," and besides these banners, there were two large United States flags, flying from the mast-heads of two rice boats.

We arrived at Kwai-Peng, Saturday noon, July 25. The Committee reported at once to Mr. J. P. Cunningham, who had taken over Mr. Shumaker's work. Mr. Cunningham had secured for us an ancestral temple, where we were conveniently housed.

Professor Lewis thus describes what is called the "general distribution" methods:

This is usually employed at the beginning of the famine when it is generally conceded that all are in need of help. The work of the committee then consists in getting out indiscriminately five or ten "catties" of rice to all who have secured tickets at the door. This is, perhaps, the easiest method for the foreigner but it is always accompanied by great crowds, which sometimes become riotous, noisy and dangerous to themselves. They push, jam and crush the weak and starving who are injured and sometimes killed. Women are as much in danger as men. Recently, here in Kwai-Peng, was "woman's day" at Kwai-Peng. It is estimated that 40,000 came in with their babies and children in arms. The crowd could not be controlled, and in the jam twenty-three were killed, of whom five were babies crushed to death on their mother's backs.

The second method is a general distribution through "The Gentry." In this case the object is to reach the village elders, who are either seen in their own villages or called into the distributing centre. They furnish the committee with a list of names which they say includes all the needy in the village. The names are counted and a certain number of catties, say ten, is allowed each person. The elders are then given a ticket for the total amount, which they arrange to take delivery of upon the next day of distribution or upon the same day, if rice is being distributed. The crowds are about the same as in the "general distribution," and consequently accompanied with fatalities which should be avoided if possible.

The third method is "house to house visitation." It is the hardest work, but gives the most satisfactory results.

By "house to house visitation" one is almost able to ferret out the suffering families in a village, but he is able also to determine which sections of the district need further help. Again, by this method the distribution of rice can be carried on simultaneously with the giving out of tickets. To do this the best scouts among Christian natives, women preferred, are sent up to the Yamen registrar's to weigh out the rice as the people call for it with their tickets. As the people usually went upon receipt of their tickets to the rice distributing hall for the large crowds were avoided.

Every method as the workers found out, had its drawbacks, but on the whole, the work was accomplished satisfactorily. Professor Lewis concludes his report with these words:

It was fortunate for the poor people that they received a generous measure, pressed tight, shaken down and running over."

Thus does the great Kwang-si famine, and its accompanying horrors pass into history. It will long be remembered in Southern China, and the one bright part of the long dark chapter will be that which tells of the generous-hearted people of the West, who filled with Christ-like sympathy for the sufferers, sent those three fleets of relief ships, filled with food, and rescued the perishing peasants from death by starvation. And to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD it will be ever a cause for thankfulness that they were privileged to be the leaders in this life-saving mission, and that their gifts and prayers were the means of fighting back the famine in Kwang-si.

OUR THIRD AND LAST RELIEF EXPEDITION UP THE WEST RIVER TO KWANG-SI

A Find in a Mosque

PROFESSOR HARNACK, the celebrated theologian, in a report recently submitted to the Berlin Academy of Sciences, described some very valuable and interesting documents which were lately unearthed in the famous mosque known as the Kubbet el Chazne, in Damascus. It was learned that there were three vaults in the mosque that contained very ancient Christian documents. These were examined, and were found to be of the time of the Crusades. There are Latin writings, a considerable number of prayers and psalms, with notes of different systems. A mysterious thing is the existence in the mosque treasury of a considerable number of Hebrew fragments of literature. These writings consist of secular documents, synagogue liturgies and Old Testament fragments. The fragments in Samaritanic language and writing will claim the greatest interest.

IS THE YOUNG MAN SAFE? ❋ DAVID'S GRIEF OVER ABSALOM

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 8
II. SAMUEL 18 : 24-33

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PROV. 17 : 25 :
"A FOOLISH SON IS A GRIEF TO HIS FATHER"

IT is the day of battle between King David's forces and the followers of Absalom. King David sits at the gate of Mahanaim, his temporary capital, which is a day's journey distant from the scene of the battle in the Wood of Ephraim. How did he come to be at Mahanaim? He had fled from Jerusalem when he learned of Absalom's approach, because he did not wish to make the Holy City the scene of bloodshed. Sad though it was, King David's retreat from Jerusalem had been an imposing spectacle. The procession was headed by a body-guard of Philistines, a strange escort for a King of the Jews, for they had been bitter enemies. David had won them to himself by a year and four months' residence in one of their cities, when he sought their protection against King Saul. The vanguard of the procession was the 600 followers who had bravely accompanied and defended David when Saul sought his life. Between the friendly Philistines and the brave defenders, marched the king himself and the high officers of his court.

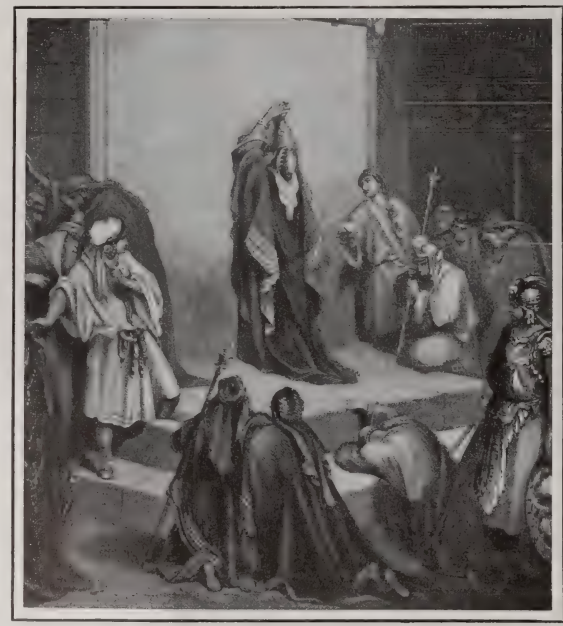
ABSALOM'S TOMB

Coming out of Jerusalem by the eastern gate, and crossing the brook Kedron, the procession had wended its way up the slopes of Mt. Olivet and down on the other side, where it was joined by another procession, the high priests and the Levites bringing the Ark of the Covenant, as if to insure God's presence with David. It was a mistaken kindness, and David ordered that the ark should be returned to its accustomed place in the Tabernacle on Mt. Zion. He felt that God's presence with him was not dependent upon the Ark. He then proceeded on to Mahanaim. His onward march had not been without incidents, some pleasant, as when provisions were brought him by those who sympathized with him; and some exasperating, as when he had been cursed by Shimei, who also threw dust upon King David and his party. One night he had camped by the way beyond the fords of the Jordan. He had laid him down and slept, for the Lord sustained him (Psalm 4). It is from his trustful song-prayer of that night that we get the prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep." David trusted God's care, and slept as a child falls asleep, without fear, when mother is watching over him. David arose in the morning with gladness, for the Lord had made him dwell in safety (Psalm 3). Upon his arrival at Mahanaim three native chiefs had shown their sympathy for him by sending him provisions. He found also an organized force of Israelites ready for his defence.

King David sits at the gate, awaiting news from the battle, which he had arranged with Joab his general-in-chief, should be sent to him. King David's eyes are dimmed with age and with tears, but there are watchmen with him who have eagle's eyes. Presently one of them spies a runner, and he shouts the fact to the king. Now the watchman spies a second runner, and announces it to the king. These runners were the messenger service of the Orient, they were fleet of foot, and ran from sixty to seventy five miles a day. The first runner comes up, and is recognized as Ahimaaz. He bows to the earth before the king, and announces that he had seen a great tumult, out of which had come victory for the king. The second runner arrives. It is Cushi, the Ethiopian slave. He also announces victory for the king. When he is asked by David, "Is the young man Absalom safe?" he answers that he wishes all of the king's enemies might be as this young man now is.

The king has the heart of a father in him and is stricken with grief, even though his son has been false to him, aye worse than false, rebellious, and has sought to undermine his authority in the nation. The king goes up to a chamber over the gate, wailing as he goes, "O my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee." So great is King David's grief for his son that the day of victory is turned into a day of mourning among all the people, as they listen to the loud wailing of their king. He is at last silenced by General Joab, who returns from the battle, goes in before the king who is his uncle, and chides him for disgracing himself and all his family by his unseemly grief. King David ceases his wailing and returns to the gate, and speaks in words of high praise for those who have won the battle.

In yonder wood, the Wood of Ephraim is a heap of stones, and under it lies the body of Absalom. Twenty thousand slain are scattered all about him, but only Absalom is covered with stones. His was an ignominious death, first hung by his hair, which had been his pride, and slain by Joab, who thrust three darts through his heart, and then taken down and cast into the pit by ten of Joab's warriors, who afterwards laid a very great heap of stones upon him. God had commanded that when a son should prove stubborn and rebellious, all of the men of his city should stone him with stones until he died (Deut. 21 : 21). Even to-day it is the custom in the Orient to throw stones upon the graves of those who have dishonored their parents. The so-called monument of Absalom is much disfigured in this way.



"WOULD GOD I HAD DIED FOR THEE, O ABSALOM, MY SON, MY SON!"

Illustration and Application

Less than five per cent. of the young men of the United States are connected religiously with its young people's Christian associations and churches—that is the blackboard on which we write the great question that this lesson brings to parents, pastors, teachers and Christian young people: "Is the young man safe?" The problem of imperilled youth, of wandering boys especially, is the one to the solution of which, in a variety of ways, this lesson should be devoted. The teacher of the "Bible Class" of parents will not forget David's mistakes in family training, while the teacher of boys will have less to say of David's leniency and more of Absalom's ingratitude and fatal ambition; but how to save the boys and young men from making such a failure of life and such an entrance in the other world as Absalom did, that is for all classes the question of this lesson and "the question of the day." The young women have their great perils, too, but in this lesson it is enough to show how they may increase or lessen the perils of young men.

Let us consider (1) The young man's perils; (2) The young man's safety. The peril that wrecked Absalom we call ambition, which in its essence was a desire to be popular. Many a young man who has too little ambition is in peril from a desire to be popular with those about him. He finds that to be virtuous in his set is to be unpopular. He will be better liked, he thinks, if he does not refuse a cigar, and if he will treat and be treated. To rebuke an oath will bring a sneer and perhaps a snub. To decline an invitation to the theatre, even when the play is one no gentleman should allow himself to see, will get him the nickname of "the Puritan," while acceptance will make men of lower ethics call him "liberal." And so a desire to please men, rather than God, has brought many a young man to early defeat and death of body or soul or both. Yielding to the desire to please in respectable forms of wrong-doing, one is soon led lower and lower among the perils of young men. For the sake of being called a "good fellow" he becomes a good-for-nothing. One of the supreme mistakes of some good people is to excuse the sins of youth lightly as a "sowing of wild oats" that is to be expected and is of no great consequence. As Ruskin says: "I had infinitely rather hear of thoughtless old age and indulgence due to that. When a man has done his work and nothing can be materially altered in his fate, let him forget his toil; but what excuse can you find for wilfulness of thought at the very time when every crisis of the future fortune hangs on your decision. A youth thoughtless! When all the happiness of his home forever depends on the chances or the passions of an hour! A youth thoughtless! When the career of all his days depends on the opportunity of a moment! A youth thoughtless! When his every act is a foundation-stone of future conduct, and every imagination a fountain of life or death! Be thoughtless in any after years rather than now." It is not a trifle to sow "wild oats," for whatsoever man soweth he shall reap and his children after him. Forgiveness even cannot recall the seed we have sown, nor prevent its awful harvest. When Israel's sin enabled its foes to capture their capital and carry from the temple the shields of gold, they were never recovered, and shields of brass had to be put in their place. Purity is gold, reform is but brass. A life once robbed of its virtue can never be as golden again.

"Wild Oats"

ABSALOM'S FLIGHT

Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, in the Atlantic Monthly, draws the moral from the story of the way in which Napier captured the fortress of Cutchee. The Sixty-fourth had lost its colors in disgrace, and Napier addressed the regiment, ordered them to capture the fort, telling them, "Your colors are on yonder height."

Old is the tale, but read anew
In every warring human heart.
What rebel hours, what coward shame,
Upon the aching memory start!
To find the ordeal forfeited—
What tears can teach the holy art?

Thou great Commander! leading on Through weakest darkness to strong light!
By any anguish, give us back
Our life's young standard pure and bright.
O fair lost colors of the soul!
For your sake storm we any height.

Here is the only piece of advice that Robert Burns is known to have given young men, an unfinished note in his diary: "If ever any young men in the vestibule of the world chance to throw his eyes over these pages, let him pay a warm attention to the following observations, as I assure him they are the fruit of my dear-bought experience. I have, literally, like that great poet, and great gallant, and by consequence great fool, Solomon, turned my eyes to behold madness and folly; nay, I have with all the ardor of a lively, fanciful and whimsical imagination, shaken hands with their intoxicating friendship. In the first place let my pupil, as he values his own peace, keep up a regular and warm intercourse with the Deity." This is but Solomon's message in a new form, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

The Young Man's Safety

That is the first step to be taken by a young man who would insure his safety and true success. Here is a decalogue of manly qualities, which, together, form an invulnerable shield: 1. Loyalty to Christ. 2. Spirituality. 3. Reverence. 4. Repose. 5. Kindness. 6. Self-command. 7. Purity. 8. Honest industry. 9. Sincerity and Truth. 10. Unselfishness. The "displacing power of a new affection" has been eloquently described. The displacing power of a noble ideal or purpose is really but another form of the same fact.

The very best story of this lesson may have been told on this page before, but is in any case so apropos that it should go with this lesson.

A youthful traveler reined up his horse where from the highway two paths led in almost parallel lines into a forest. "Which of these roads leads to the city?" he inquired of an old man working by the roadside. "Both," he answered, "but the right-hand road is safest." "But the other is broader—more beaten, and of course more traveled; it looks pleasanter, too, and I'll risk its safety!" So, lightly touching the side of his horse, he galloped on. The old man looked up from his spade, and called out in a loud voice, "You'd better take the safe road, young man!" But he called in vain. The young man dashed heedlessly on till coming suddenly in the dim twilight to the swollen river, he plunged in and was lost. The application is self-evident. "YOU'D BETTER TAKE THE SAFE ROAD, YOUNG MAN." No one is safe until he is saved.

A REGIMENT OF COLOMBIAN SOLDIERS. STEAM DREDGE ON THE CANAL. NEGRO TROOPS IN COLOMBIA

The Failure of Negotiations with Colombia

Isthmian Canal Difficulties

...For the Construction of the Panama Canal

NEW difficulties appear to have developed in the situation at Panama. Though President Marroquin was authorized by the Colombian Congress to negotiate a new treaty with the United States, he does not appear to have been allowed much discretion. It was stipulated that the treaty should be upon the lines indicated by the Congress, and also that when made, it should be submitted to the Senate for confirmation. These stipulations are a bad omen for any treaty. The concessions made by Mr. Hay in the treaty he negotiated with Mr. Herran were the utmost that our country would approve. Indeed, it was generally considered that better terms had been granted to Colombia than the circumstances warranted. It seems, therefore, certain, that if the Colombian Congress was not satisfied with them, as its rejection of the treaty implied, it will get no better. Our Senate would be little likely to ratify a treaty which gave Colombia any other advantages. The probability, therefore, is that until Colombia has a new President and a new Senate there will be no further step toward the construction of this much-needed work.

A curious discusssion has arisen in the Colombian Senate, which gives a clue to the motive for the delays and obstacles placed by Colombian statesmen in the way of the negotiations. It is claimed that the extension of time granted to the new Panama Company for the completion of the canal was unconstitutional. This extension gave the company until 1910 for the completion of the work, or for making arrangements for its completion by others. If that extension proves to be not valid according to Colombian law, the little republic may seize the uncompleted canal and annul the concession. It would then be in a position to receive from the United States the forty million dollars which we have agreed to pay the French Company for the partly finished work.

It is a significant illustration of Colombian ideas of honor that the Senate should suppose that the United States would become a party to any such scheme of robbery. If the work already done on the canal, and the privileges of the concession are worth $40,000,000, the money certainly belongs to the people who performed the work, and not to the Colombian Government, even though it held possession of it, under confiscation. Our Government, in dealing with the Panama Company, recognized its rights, and would not recognize a transfer of those rights to any other power, especially if the transfer had been forced by sharp practice. It is an ominous fact that from beginning to end the Panama scheme has been associated with fraud, and is discredited both in France and Colombia. Our own Government, however, has kept its hands clean, and is sufficiently shrewd to see that the money it is prepared to pay, goes to the people who are entitled to receive it.

President Roosevelt is now at liberty to negotiate with Nicaragua, for the construction of a canal by that route, if he deems the failure of the negotiations with Colombia final. That the Nicaraguan route is feasible, many eminent engineers have averred. Indeed, it has advantages in climate and in natural facilities, which the Panama route, though more direct, does not possess. Nature has already done much of the work by providing a large lake and navigable rivers which would thus reduce the cost of constructing a canal. It would, it is true, require the use of locks which would delay the passage of a ship through the canal, but that is the question of only a few hours, and is not to be compared with the present delay of three months in sailing around the Horn. It is very certain that a canal across the Isthmus is urgently needed and must be speedily constructed; if, therefore, Colombia is stubborn in resisting our offer, we have a right to turn to Nicaragua.

The possibility of our Government abandoning the Panama route and taking up that of Nicaragua may bring the Colombian Government to its senses. Only about one-third of the canal across the Isthmus has been cut, and there is little probability of the work being completed unless the United States undertakes the task. Our Government, in the treaty rejected by the Colombian Senate offered to pay a bonus of $10,000,000 for the privilege of finishing the canal and an annual rental of a quarter of a million dollars. So good an offer is not likely to be made by any other power, and if it is finally rejected, the Colombian government will have on its hands nothing but a long ditch and a quantity of rotting machinery. It is said that the people of the republic realize the folly of their leaders and are indignant at their lack of patriotic enterprise. A Presidential election is now impending, which will give them an opportunity of expressing their wishes, and it is for the change of rulers which may then occur that President Roosevelt is urged to wait before definitely closing negotiations.

RAILROAD DEPOT AT COLON, THE ATLANTIC TERMINUS OF THE PANAMA CANAL.

The distance across the isthmus at the place selected, is forty miles, but as it is necessary to follow the line of the valleys, the canal would be forty-six miles long, having the port of Colon on the Atlantic side and Panama on the Pacific side as the termini. It has to cross the range of mountains which stand in its way. The pass through which the canal will go is 1,360 feet above sea level and if a lock is not made, the cutting through the pass will be twelve miles in length. Another difficulty that has perplexed the engineers, is the Chagres River, which in its windings crosses the route of the canal six times. Though the river in the dry seasons is only about three feet deep, it becomes in the wet seasons a raging torrent thirty feet deep. The engineering problem, however, can be overcome, if the political obstacles were surmounted, and it is estimated that not more than one hundred million dollars would be needed for the whole work, a small sum in comparison with the advantages which the canal would give. For the accompanying illustrations we are indebted to the courtesy of Collier's Weekly.

A SCENE ON THE PANAMA CANAL

THE EXCAVATION AT THE MOUNTAIN PASS

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper, which creates sensation, and brings to its side many new friends.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. The great audience sits spell-bound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told.

"RIGHT to quit any time. Wrong not to quit," Andy said, and before Walker could stop him he had gone around another table and out of the side door.

Walker followed, still swearing. "I'll even up with you for that brother of yours," he said, following Andy up the street.

Andy turned and shook his fist at him. They were both in the middle of the street, and both continued to stagger along cursing each other. As they came opposite the Methodist church, Andy stopped and waited for Walker to come up.

"Leave following me!" he exclaimed.

"I won't! You've got my money, you—you cheated!"

"I didn't. You lie!" Andy replied, in a drunken rage. He stooped over to pick up a stone in the street, and Walker fired at him three times in succession. Andy reeled, took one step toward Walker, and fell, face downwards, in the dirt. Walker threw his revolver into the gutter, and then turned and ran back in the direction of the saloon. Andy lay still in the place where he had fallen, and one more crime was added to the thousands upon thousands that drink and the saloon have helped to produce, since alcohol was first brewed by man out of God's bread-stuff.

It was nearly midnight when Rod reached home. He had driven as fast as he dared, thinking all the while of the brother he had left, and his mother who was waiting for him.

Copyright, 1903, by Charles M Sheldon.

She came to the door as he drove up, and before he had stopped the horses, she called out:

"Tell me, Rod, is Andy all right! Is he safe?"

"Yes, yes, mother. I left him in bed in his room. He promised to give up the drink and the cards and—"

Rod drove out to the barn, put up the team and came back to the house, where he finished telling his mother the story of the evening.

Mrs. Miner, who had spent the long day and evening in a fever of apprehension, was quieted by his narrative.

"Then you do think he will grow up to be a good man, don't you, Rod? He will learn a lesson from it, won't he?"

"I hope so." Rod spoke slowly. He did not tell his mother what he had said to Andy.

Mrs. Miner went to bed and to sleep. In the morning, Rod heard her singing as she was washing the breakfast dishes. She had not done that for months. The boy went up to her and kissed her, a very unusual thing for him to do.

"I'm glad you feel so well, mother," he said.

"It's on account of Andy," she said. "He is my baby, you know. But you're both good boys to me."

"I'm going to work at the fence down in the two mile swale, this morning, mother. So I may not get back at noon. But I'll come between twelve and one some time."

"All right, Rod. Don't break your back over those heavy posts. You don't ever have any rest."

"I don't need any, mother. One of these days when we get the farm paid for I mean to see that you have a rest for the remainder of your days."

His mother smiled at him, and noticed his sturdy figure as he drove the team out of the barn yard.

"I've got two good boys. Andy's going to be all right, I'm sure," she said, as she continued to sing at her work.

About eleven o'clock, a man in a buggy drove up to the little farmhouse and got down slowly. The horse was covered with lather and stood panting with exhaustion.

Mrs. Miner came to the door.

"Are you Mrs. Miner?" the man asked.

"Yes."

"I've a letter for you;" the man handed it to her, and avoided her look.

It was from the Methodist minister, and it contained news of an accident to Andy. She was asked to go with the messenger back to Colby at once.

Mrs. Miner read the letter slowly, and raised her eyes to the man.

"Tell me the truth about this accident," she exclaimed, with a calmness that astonished him.

"He was shot," the man said after a silence, and again he looked down.

"And killed?" she asked, taking a step towards him.

The man looked up at her.

"He was killed, wasn't he?" she said gently.

The man choked down something.

"Yes, ma'am, he was. I'm awful sorry. It must be a dreadful blow to——"

"Three of my little ones gone, and now Andy! He was safe—" she began to reel on her feet, and the man hastily took hold of her and helped her into the house, and upon the couch.

"Where's your other son?" he asked. "You need him now."

She told him quite coherently, and immediately began to talk about her three pretty little ones. The man hesitated, but finally went out and drove as fast as his horses could go, down to the two mile swale. He found Rod there, and at once told him the news of Andy's death, and the way his mother had taken it.

Rod got into the buggy at once, and

From the things for which we yearn,
Sure of sweetest compensation
In the truth we need to learn
We can bear the bitter heartache
Past the cure of earthly balm,
For there comes a golden morrow
Freighted with unmeasured calm.

We can bear life's saddest parting,
Know life's sweetest music o'er,
Sure of harmonies eternal,
When we clasp our own once more.
For the plans that were defeated,
For the hopes that slowly died,
For life's countless disappointings,
Hearts shall yet be satisfied.

All the dreams so dear—so tender—
That were smitten to the dust,
They shall rise again in splendor,
If we wait with heart of trust.
Sure as there is food for hunger—
Sound and sight for ear and eye,
Blest fulfillment of our longings,
Love at last, will satisfy.

CONSISTENCY IN LIFE*

The Injury Done to the Cause of Christ by Inconsistent Professors

ONE of the most convincing proofs of the Divine origin of the Bible and of our faith, is that after the lapse of so many centuries, and after so many changes of social condition, the principles of conduct laid down for our guidance are still applicable to our lives. Nothing could be further, for example, from the problems with which we have to deal, than the question, which was so vital to the Christians of the first century, of eating food which had been consecrated to idols. No one now would give a thought to the question, but when the apostle deals with it, he gives us principles which touch our conduct in our own difficulties. He teaches that the question of whether we shall do, or not do, a certain thing, is not completely settled for us, when we have decided that the thing is not wrong in itself. An act which may be innocent, may have an injurious effect on others. We are bound to consider the welfare of our brethren. One man may indulge in an amusement which does him no harm, while another man indulging in the same amusement, may be enmeshed in evil and brought to ruin. The strong man ought therefore to take into account the effect of his example on his weaker brother.

It is also important to consider the effect of our conduct on the world. It is a sad fact that men often say that they do not see that religion makes much difference to the lives of those who profess it. As a worldly man said, recently, referring to a Christian who is prominent in a certain church: "You would never guess from his life that he is a Christian. In his business, in society, and in his amusements, he is just the same as we are. His religion has no effect upon him and I doubt if it has upon any one." It was a lame inference to draw, but it is drawn every day. Men judge of religion by its effect on the lives they see, and so the cause of Christ suffers by every act inconsistent with our profession. If the Christian finds his pleasure in the same places and ways that the world finds it, worldly people are not slow to believe that religion does not change the nature to the extent that it is said to do, and therefore that it is not worth having.

A Good Use for Premiums.

Dear Editor:—I have just been thinking you might be interested to know what your readers do with the premiums you so kindly give them. I have mounted four of them on a tin plate—a sheet 22x28. First I put on this plate a sheet of cream-colored paper, leaving one inch and a half of the tin sheet as a border. Then I put the "Two Families" on the top left-hand corner, and the "Sheep in a Storm" on the top right-hand corner, with the "Horse Fair" under it, and the "Arab Chief" under the "Two Families." Then I put all under a frame two and a half inches deep, leaving an inch of the tin as a border round the cream-colored paper. The combination makes a fine picture. I admire a good picture, and have often been very much pleased with illustrations in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD came back to the house. His mother was not there. He ran out of the house and over to the cottonwood grove where the four graves were.

He found his mother seated on his father's grave, with her back to the other three, making some lines on the ground. As Rod laid his hand on her shoulder, she said with a smile—"Yes, there is room for another right here. I have been measuring. See, Rod! One, two, three, four, five, six feet this way, and one, two, three feet this way. Only it's cold here, when it storms. Couldn't we—Rod, take 'em into the house when it rains? It's so cold out here."

"Come, mother," Rod spoke between his clenched teeth, to shut down fierce sobs, "come, you are not well. Come into the house!"

"No, I will not come! I am going to stay here until they bring him to me. I am going to dig his grave! There is no one else can dig his grave like me. I made all his baby clothes!"

She leaned over and began to dig into the ground with the cottonwood stake she had in her hand. When Rod attempted to lead her away, she turned upon him fiercely and struck at him. He put his powerful arms about her and carried her into the house, and she shrieked and bit him on the cheek, so that the blood ran down his face as he laid her on the bed.

The man went back to Colby alone, and that evening a doctor came out. Rod had never left his mother's side. The doctor gave no hope. That trembling reason which had faltered and fallen on the side of madness, during those moments when the stricken mother prayed her crazy prayers had now altogether left the throne, and what was left was a dangerous maniacal power that called for incessant watchfulness. As soon as the legal steps could be taken, Rod had placed his mother in the State Asylum, and gone back to the lonely farm, a brooding, bitter, hard young life, known among the scattered neighbors in that township as uncompanionable and silent, the tragedy of drink branded into what might otherwise have been one of the stalwart, useful children of men.

In the State Asylum, there is a woman who every night in a padded cell is heard to pray for her baby Andy. It is the same prayer of accusation and petition. The attendants know it by heart, and pay no more attention to it than to any other of the ravings of their patients. The Methodist minister who once heard it on a visit to the asylum, did not recover from the effect for weeks, and says it was the most pitiable thing he ever listened to.

Jake Lawson is getting rich. He drives one of the best turnouts in Colby. He is putting a large addition to his house this summer. Jim Walker got off on a plea of self-defense, and is one of Lawson's best customers. And the prayers of widows and mothers all over the world still go up to God. Is God dead that he does not hear? And are men dead to all love and justice, that they still license and support the only institution in the world which has centuries to its record of producing crime, insanity, pauperism, broken hearts and ruined lives? What of this mother's prayers? Are they wasted? Make answer, brothers and sisters. For the blood of these little ones and these crushed ones, cries out to us from the ground.

When Douglas finished and walked back to his seat, for a moment there was the most intense silence all over the audience. Then a faint hand-clapping began. It grew in volume until it swept over the audience. It grew in volume until it swept up over the rows of seats like a wind among the leaves. Again it was taken up, and Douglas had to rise and bow. But the audience kept on applauding, and Mr. Vernon turned to Esther.

"They want you to go forward with Douglas."

Esther blushed, but Mr. Sage settled the matter by getting up, and taking Esther by one hand and Douglas by the other, he led them up to the front of the platform, when the crowd cheered again.

"Your chapter was better than mine, Frank," Esther said, as they took their seats.

"You were my inspiration," he replied. "But I don't agree with your statement."

Mr. Sage introduced Mr. Vernon as the last speaker on the programme, and Mr. Vernon went forward. The minister had watched the crowd during the story-reading, and saw his opportunity.

"I'm not going to make any speech," he said. "I'm going to let you make it. The best way to close this most remarkable picnic in the history of Payson Township is for all of us to go on record against the saloon and the drink and all they represent. So I propose that every body here sign the pledge, and promise Almighty God to do everything in our power from this day, by votes and prayers and daily lives, to annihilate the liquor business around the world."

There was a moment's silence. Then the crowd applauded again. Evidently the minister had rightly interpreted the spirit of the audience, and the impression made upon it by the reading of the story. Douglas had not followed the real facts in the case of Mrs. Lane's boy with literal exactness, but he had retained the main facts as they had actually occurred. Every farmer in Payson township was familiar with the tragedy. The use of Jake Lawson's name, and the appearance of that individual in the grove that day, had helped to give the reading of Douglas' chapter intense interest to all present. So Mr. Vernon reckoned quite truly that a good time had struck for pressing home the truth in a practical way.

Before that memorable day closed, over three thousand persons in Sage's grove had signed the pledge, and had also thereby practically gone on record to act politically against the saloon. Out of the three thousand names signed there were over 700 men, old and young. It was a surprise to the local politicians present, and furnished material for conversation during the entire drive back to Colby.

"Well, this has been a big day for Anderson County, Douglas," said Mr. Vernon, when the Colby party was on the road home after a hearty farewell from Mr. Sage and a promise to be present at the next picnic. "I regard to-day's work as specially significant. It will have its effect on the whole State."

"The whole thing was just a bursting success," Mr. Edwards exclaimed. "Esther and Douglas simply covered themselves with glory. I declare I felt so sorry for that Mrs. Miner that I would have signed the pledge a hundred times if it would make her happy."

"I hope you feel sorry for me, too, James," said Mrs. Edwards, who was riding back home with a scarf thrown over her head in place of her hat, which had been left behind, a hopeless ruin.

"I'll buy you six hats, and bake you six pies, Julia, first thing in the morning. My! But we have had a glorious day. Have you enjoyed it, George?"

"Yes, sir. That hoss race was the finest thing I've seen this summer."

"Wasn't it!" Mr. Edwards chuckled. "Farmer Sage leaning over the dashboard, slapping that old plug with the lines, paying no more attention to Jake Lawson's pop, pop, pop, than if they were so many flies. And the beer kegs bobbing up and down and that one hitting the old horse on the shins! It will be a long time before we see anything like it again."

Diamonds on Credit
under the LOFTIS SYSTEM means that any person of honest intentions, no matter how far away they may live, may open a Confidential Charge Account for a Diamond, Watch or other valuable article of jewelry, and pay the same in a series of easy monthly payments.

How to Do It.
Write to-day for our beautifully illustrated Catalogue, and from it select any article that you would like to wear or own; or, perhaps use as a gift to a loved one. We will send your selection on approval to your home, place of business or express office as you prefer. Examine it as leisurely and as carefully as you wish; then, if it is all that you anticipated, and the best value you ever saw for the money asked—pay one-fifth of the price and keep it. The balance you may send us in eight equal monthly payments.

On the Other Hand,
if you decide not to buy, simply return the article to us at our expense. Whether you buy or not, we pay all express and other charges—you pay nothing, neither do you assume any risk or obligation whatever. We submit our goods on their merits, with absolute confidence that their quality, low price and our easy terms of payment will command your favor. We ask but one opportunity for adding your name to the largest list of pleased customers with which a diamond house was ever honored.

We Are the Largest House in the Diamond business. We are also one of the oldest—Est. 1858. We refer to any bank in America—ask your local bank how we stand in the business world. They will refer to their Commercial Agency books and tell you that we stand very high, and that our representations may be accepted without question.

Our Guarantee Certificate
given with every Diamond, is the broadest and strongest ever issued by a responsible concern. Further, we give the broad guarantee of complete satisfaction to every purchaser. Our exchange system is the most liberal ever devised, for it permits you to return any Diamond bought of us, and get the full amount paid in exchange for other goods or a larger Diamond.

Your Christmas Plans will not be complete until you have looked through our Catalogue, and considered what you can do in gift-making in conjunction with the LOFTIS SYSTEM. The $5 or $10 you might pay for something cheap and trashy, will make the first payment on, and put you in immediate possession of a splendid Diamond or Watch. You can thus make gifts that are commensurate with, and appropriate to the circumstances, without any considerable initial outlay. There can be no more favorable time than the present for buying a Diamond. Prices are advancing steadily, and a profit of 15 or 20 per cent. within a year seems assured. Dealers generally agree in this prediction.

To the Cash Buyer of Diamonds, we have a proposition to make, which is thoroughly characteristic of our house. It is nothing less than a written agreement to return all that they pay for a Diamond—less ten per cent., at any time within one year. Thus, one might wear a fifty-dollar Diamond for a whole year, then send it back and get $45 00, making the cost of wearing the Diamond less than ten cents per week.

Ivers & Pond PIANOS.

This beautiful new style is distinctly up to date. It's the very latest thing in artistic piano casings. Designed by one of the world's most famous artists, it embodies all that good taste, refinement and the most modern ideas can suggest. The musical qualities are in perfect harmony with the beauty of the outside case. The interior is the regular standard Ivers & Pond quality, which means that nothing better is made or can be made. Our 1904 styles are the most beautiful musically and architecturally that we have ever made. We will gladly send our new catalogue, showing cuts of all our 1904 styles, on request.

HOW TO BUY.

If no dealer near you sells them, we can supply you from Boston. An order entrusted to us will be executed with the nicest discrimination in regard to tone quality, perfection of action and beauty of case finish, that would be exercised were the piano to be for the personal use of one of our officers. The wisdom of this care on our part is obvious when we willingly ship the piano subject to approval, not asking that it be accepted unless it proves entirely satisfactory. We sell on time payments (in the most remote village or city in the United States as simply and safely as if you lived in Boston), requiring a small cash remittance at time of purchase, and balance in 12, 24 or 36 equal monthly payments. Old pianos taken in exchange. A personal letter with list of cash and time prices if you will write.

OUR HOME MUSIC CLASS

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON VIII.

Triplets.—In the preceding lesson we learned to divide the time of a pulse into half pulses, quarter pulses, and combinations of halves and quarters. Continuing the topic of divided pulses, we are next to learn to divide the pulse into thirds.

Illustration.—With the aid of the metronome and tapping, sing a succession of whole pulse tones, to Taa, and when the movement goes steadily begin singing to each swing or each tap a word of three syllables, such as "mer-ri-ly," "cheer-i-ly," "read-i-ly," "stead-i-ly," pronouncing the three syllables in equal time, with the accent on the first. In doing this you will be singing three tones to the pulse, dividing the pulse into thirds. The effect is precisely like three-pulse measure sung quickly. Try the exercise again, singing "Taa-tai-tee" instead of merrily, etc., and again, singing "la-la-la," to each swing or tap.

16.—A pulse divided into thirds is called a Triplet. A triplet is represented by the figure 3 in connection with a group of notes.

Study the next two exercises first as straight time exercises, on a single pitch, to the time-names "Taa," "Taa-tai-tee," etc., then to la, and then the tune to the syllables and to la.

Ex. 41. A triplet (♪³♪) is a group of three notes performed in the time of two of the same denomination.

Taa taa Taa-tai-tee taa, etc.

Ex. 42.

Come, mer - ri - ly march, and come, cheer - i - ly sing, mer - ri - ly, cheer - i - ly sing

Varieties of Measure.—Before taking up this topic it would be well for the pupil to review what has been taught in the previous lessons concerning time, accent and measure. This will show him that thus far in our studies the quarter note, mainly, has been used to represent the time of a pulse.

17.—Any note may be taken to represent the time of a pulse. The notes commonly used as pulse notes are the quarter, the half and the eighth note.

With the half note as the pulse-note, one pulse tones are represented by half notes, two pulse tones by whole notes, half pulse tones by quarter notes, and so on. With the eighth note as the pulse-note, that note would then represent a one pulse tone, the quarter note a two pulse tone, half pulse tones would be represented by sixteenth notes, and so on.

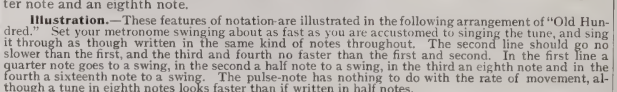
18.—The use of different notes for pulse-notes causes what is called Varieties of Measure. The kind of measure is determined by the number of its pulses; the variety is shown by the kind of note taken as the pulse-note.

19.—The different kinds and varieties of measure are indicated by figures in the form of a fraction, the upper figure denoting the number of pulses in the measure, and the lower figure the kind of note that goes to a pulse.

The lower figures, 2, 4, and 8, in a measure sign indicate, respectively, a half note, a quarter note and an eighth note.

Illustration.—These features of notation are illustrated in the following arrangement of "Old Hundred." Set your metronome swinging about as fast as you are accustomed to singing the tune, and sing it through as though written in the same kind of notes throughout. The second line should go no slower than the first, and the third and fourth no faster than the first and second. In the first line a quarter note goes to a swing, in the second a half note to a swing, in the third an eighth note and in the fourth a sixteenth note to a swing. The pulse-note has nothing to do with the rate of movement, although a tune in eighth notes looks faster than if written in half notes.

Ex. 43.



Ex. 44. As a test exercise, copy the following in notes in Key C, treble staff, four-pulse measure, quarter note to the pulse. Supply the clef, the measure sign and the bars. The figures over the letters indicate the time-values to be written in notes; 1 means one pulse, 2 means two pulses, ½ means half pulse, and so on. Sing it from the written copy. Again, copy it in Key D, half note to the pulse.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Believer in prayer. "In my extremity, I asked the Lord, in Christ's name, to avert an impending danger. He answered—not in the way I expected, but a better way and one that has taught me a great lesson concerning our Father's wisdom."

E. D. M., Grand Blanc, Mich. "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayers many times, especially lately, when in trials and tribulations. Praise his holy name, he heard and answered."

C. B. M. E., New Britain, Ct. "A great trouble came to me, which I prayed I might be delivered from. My prayer has been answered. To his holy name be all the praise."

Reader, Granville, N. Y. "I must praise God for answering many of my prayers, and I expect an answer very soon to my prayer, that my husband may be saved from strong drink, which is fast becoming his ruin."

Friend, Pennsylvania. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God for answering many of my prayers in my past life. I have been praying for one object for over a year, and my prayers have been answered in a way and at a time that I thought not."

Mrs. C. B. D. "I know that God hears and answers prayer. He has heard and answered mine more than I deserved."

Reader, Hinton, W. Va. "I know God hears and answers prayer, for I have received answers to my prayers. I will ever trust him."

Interested, Savannah, N. Y. "I prayed the Lord to remove a trouble that seemed insurmountable, from a human standpoint. He granted my prayer. Many times have I had answer to prayer. I have implicit faith in prayer, not only in the great, but also in the trivial affairs of life."

E. S., Star Lime Works, Ky. "I had two very ungodly brothers. In answer to prayer, one was converted, and became a useful minister of the gospel, after about five years' petitioning on my part, and died in the triumph of faith twenty years ago. The other resisted for thirty years, but all that time my faith never wavered. I had the sad pleasure of seeing him pass over the dark river a year ago with the brightest hope. All of our children are saved, in answer to unremitting prayer, began as soon as they were born. My now sainted mother taught me to pray early in life, and the habit of praying, with the expectation of being answered, has grown as I advance in life; and now, at the age of fifty-two, I sometimes feel that there is nothing else to do but ask and receive."

F. W. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. "God has greatly answered a number of prayers for me."

L. A. B., Auburn Four Corners, Pa. "I have been greatly strengthened by reading the letters of so many people whom God has blessed, and I now wish to acknowledge his great goodness to me. A great burden was resting on my life, which I prayed might be removed. God answered my prayers, and I believe he will answer all our prayers if we only trust and believe him."

J. M. S., Newport, R. I. "It is very delightful to look back over an experience of forty years, and remember the unmistakable answers to prayer. Many times I have prayed that my Father in heaven would bless me in the ways of my own appointment, and the answers would come in his own, and better ways. Such an answer has come very recently."

E. H. W., Tyler, Pa. "I wish to add my testimony to those who have received answers to prayers. Surely God hears us when we come to him in faith, as I have proved from experience."

May M. E. "Years ago I sent a request for prayer to your paper. It was that a brother and brother-in-law might be delivered from drunkenness. The prayer has been answered."

Alice, Lewisburg, O. "I was in great trouble and cried unto the Lord, and the answer came. I thank him for his goodness and mercy."

Letters acknowledging answered prayers have also been received from N. J. B., Riverside, Va.; Constant Reader, Oakville, Ind.; Reader, Colville, Wash.; Reader, Berkshire, N. Y.; Mrs. M. S. E., Fredericksburg, Ia., and many others.

From "ODD JOBS" to a COMPETENCY

WILLIAM C. RICHARDS was doing "odd jobs" in his town in southern Michigan when he answered an advertisement for agents to represent THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL and THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. The first month he earned $64.00 in commissions and prize money and dropped the odd jobs.

Through this work he heard of an important position with a Western railroad from several officers of which he had secured subscriptions. They had been pleased with Richards' tact and energy, and he secured the position. He writes: "The subscription work paid me much better than any previous employment and gave me an invaluable knowledge of men and methods. I can recommend it to any ambitious young fellow who is cramped up in a small town."

THE BRAVE PROPHET*

Elijah, the Reprover of King and Queen, the Godly Man in a Degenerate Time

PEOPLE living under republican institutions cannot fully realize the grand courage of a prophet like Elijah. The kingly office, especially when that king is an autocrat, commands a reverence almost religious. The very style of address as we read it in the Bible and other ancient books, shows with what awe and humility the ordinary citizen came into the presence of royalty. What then must have been the intrepidity of Elijah, when he suddenly stood before wicked King Ahab and denounced him! It was an evil time. Queen Jezebel was worse than her husband, and more vindictive than he. She, it would seem, was mainly responsible for the lapse of Israel into the foul worship of the detestable Baal. As we have seen recently in China, a woman on the throne, when she is wholly bad, is more unscrupulous and relentless than a man. But Elijah softened none of his asperity in dealing with her. Like John Knox in Scotland, Elijah faced the cruel queen and warned her of her doom. When such men are called of God to reprove kings, neither ingrained reverence for royal persons, nor fears for their own safety can bridle their tongues.

Elijah was a model of faith as well as of courage. James, in his epistle, holds him up as an example of the power of prayer. The incident which impressed James was the prayers for drought and for rain. Still more remarkable than those prayers was the impressive spectacle on Mount Carmel. How devoutly and firmly he must have believed in God, to have proposed that test of the heavenly fire! It is one of the most heroic scenes in Biblical history. That one man holding fast his faith in God while all that was most powerful in the nation opposed him. He was not as really alone as he thought, but he was alone in that controversy. He stood forth valiantly as the solitary representative of Jehovah, and staked his life and liberty on the issue.

Yet, as James reminds us, he was simply a man, and one of like passions with other men. There came a time when he, like the modern Christian, became weary of life and longed for death. His had been a stormy life, and we cannot wonder at his despair. Like him, too, the modern Christian, has had the strange revelation of God. Not in terrifying judgments, not in thunder or whirlwind, but in the still small voice does God speak to his servant.

Ceylon's Edenic Legend

CEYLON, according to a native legend, holds the site of Eden. Travelers there are shown Adam's Peak and Adam's Bridge, the chain of rocks and islet which the maps show stretching across from Ceylon to the coast of India. Eve, or Heba, as the Ceylonese legend calls her, was satisfied with her lot in the Garden of Ceylon; but Atami, manlike, showed a disposition to rove, or, as we might now say, emigrate. One day, while wandering on the west coast, he met a strange man, who, in the course of conversation, held before him a fascinating panorama of the lovely country across the waters. Atami had seen nothing like it in Ceylon. He had always been trying to coax Heba into emigration without success; but now his mind was made up, and he went home to the shades of Adam's Peak and ordered her to pack up and make ready for a start. Heba pleaded in vain, but Atami was persistent, and led the way across "Adam's Bridge" to India, where he found, to his dismay, a dreary and forbidding wilderness. The stranger, says the legend, had deceived Atami, and the disappointed wanderer fell into despair. Then it was that the angel messenger came, and gave the disobedient Atami orders to go on into the desert and wild places, and suffer the punishment that was his due. Atami's nobility of spirit showed itself here, for he begged the angel to intercede, that his own punishment might be doubled and Heba permitted to return to the Garden of Eden and be given a fresh mate and a fresh start!

Mrs. Bird's Welcome Home.

FOR the first time for many years, Mrs. Bird has taken a vacation from her work at the Gospel Settlement and the Bowery Mission. The position this devoted woman has come to occupy in the lives of hundreds of the homeless men of the metropolis is a very touching one. Many a poor fellow who has never made any profession of religion would readily give his life for "Mother" Bird. The respect for her is such that when policemen, tradesmen, newsboys, hucksters, or even saloon-keepers, see the kindly-faced lady, clad in mourning dress, approaching, they immediately raise their hats.

Often, on a stormy night, as she leaves the Mission, where she has been busily at work for three or four hours in her meeting, some unfortunate man, who is looking forward to a long night's weary tramp, will start out of the shadows, and with a courtesy that tells of better circumstances in the past, will say "Mother Bird, may I see you home?" And off they go together, through the slush and storm of Canal street, to the heart of New York's great Ghetto, where she lives.

For several weeks this summer, Mrs. Bird's chair on the Bowery Mission platform was vacant. Then at last the question became very frequent and very eager, "When is she coming back?" Her friends, knowing how much pure country air meant to one of her age and abundant labors, kept her first at the seashore, and afterwards up in the mountains, as long as they could. But the happy evening that restored her to her "boys" came at last, and a wonderful scene was witnessed. The Mission hall was so crowded that hundreds of men could not even get near the door. Inside, however, everything was charged with the electricity of happy excitement. Hung up on the front of the organ was the motto "Welcome to our Mother." Flowers and palms decorated the platform. A welcome hymn had been composed by the Superintendent, and put to music by the Organist. One or two rehearsals had enabled the crowd to master the chorus, and when Mr. Hunt, the baritone of the Mission, rose to sing the solo, every man rose with him, and loudly and lustily was the chorus sung. One of the verses of the Welcome song goes thus:

"Oft in the summer days,
Soft as the falling dew,
Sung by the seas, borne on the breeze,
Our thoughts have flown to you.
To you who, ceaseless, share
Our sorrows and our joys,
Whose tender love leads us above,
Oh, Mother of the Boys!"

If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who have helped the Mission could have seen and heard, they would have felt amply repaid for all their gifts. To know that such an interest has been created in the hearts of this great mass of once hopeless men, is in itself a foretaste of that great reward that is assuredly promised to those who, in Christ's name, "turn many to righteousness."

CALLED HIGHER.

Edward L. Trumbull, an aged Christian, died in Albany, N. Y., recently. He was born March 19, 1832, at Lassellville, N. Y. In 1863 he married Mary P. Drake. Mr. Trumbull was for thirty years a faithful member of the M. E. Church, and acted as choir and class leader, and Sunday School Superintendent. He was a well-known school teacher, and many of his pupils are now physicians, ministers, lawyers, teachers and business men, who remember his kindly Christian example.

Jacob Wolf, who passed away on Sept. 18, at his home in Batavia, O., was born in Birkweiler, Germany, in 1826. From childhood he was a faithful and conscientious Christian, and at the time of his death was a member of the U. B. Church, and held the position of class leader for many years.

C. R. Shroy, of Sterling, Va., passed away lately after a short illness. He was twenty-four years old, and had never taken a drink of intoxicants in his life. He was a stanch Christian, and was converted about five years ago.

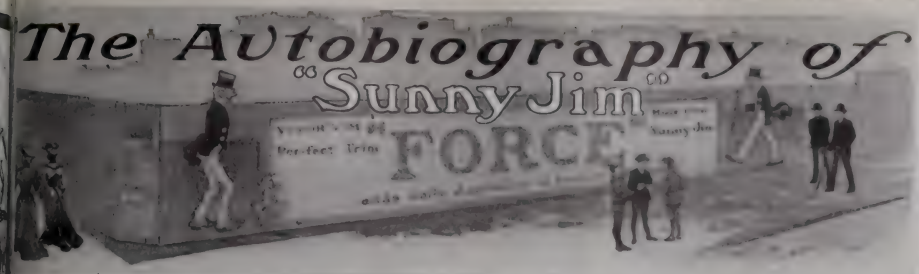
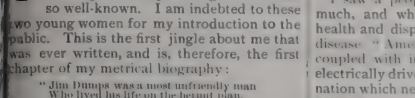
The Autobiography of "Sunny Jim"



IT was a girl who wrote the first, now famous, jingle of "Sunny Jim," and it was her girl chum who made the first drawing of the quaint figure which is so well-known. I am indebted to these two young women for my introduction to the public. This is the first jingle about me that was ever written, and is, therefore, the first chapter of my metrical biography:

"Jim Dumps was a most unfriendly man
Who lived his life on the hermit plan.
He'd never stop for a friendly smile,
But trudged along in his moody style.
'Till 'Force' one day was served to him—
Since then they call him 'Sunny Jim.'"

And this is the way it was served up to the public, who soon saw it in their newspapers, in the street cars, and on the walls and fences from New York to San Francisco.



It was through this verse and others like it, telling of the transformation of myself from Jim Dumps into "Sunny Jim," that the world became familiar with me and, as a consequence, with the food that made me sunny.

Almost as soon as I appeared thus as an apostle of the gospel of sunshine, came the demand for more verses and pictures dealing with my experiences.

It became necessary to call in the aid of other writers and illustrators—and soon nearly all of the popular contributors of verse and pictures whose names fill the contents tables of the magazines were engaged in furnishing chapters from my eventful life.

In Everybody's Mouth

NOR was the general public behind in its zeal; suggestions poured in from every State in the Union—every mail brought its versions of my wonderful recovery from gloom to sunniness.

Often the ideas suggested by people who ate "Force" and believed in it were as good as, or better than, those submitted by the best minor poets of the country and the trained writers of advertising literature.

I have been drawn by many artists (and many others), but all who have ventured to depict me have so carefully reproduced my perhaps familiar features and my favorite style of dress that I now believe I have a bowing acquaintance with nearly every man, woman and child in the country.

And the thing about this that pleases me most is that wherever I am known a little more of sunniness comes than used to.

I don't think the people took me seriously at first, but they tried the food I recommended and liked it—began to eat it regularly and to thrive upon it—began to "be sunny" themselves, so that now, when I meet them in the pages of their favorite magazines, or upon the streets, they give me a pleasant, almost unanimous smile of recognition that no mortal ever receives.

How this came about seems simple enough to me. The best thing that ever happened to me was realizing that what I ate had more to do with my life's happiness than anything else I did.

Early in my investigation of the relations between food and feeling—between what you eat and the way you live—I found that about the pleasantest quality in the world was sunniness and that no one thing depends so much on food as does the sunny nature.

I said to myself: "I will make a food that will produce more sunshine in the world than any other food that has ever been made and I will teach the people to eat it by telling them the reason why."

I looked over the world and saw that there was one thing that everybody ate, and that was wheat.

I saw a people who ate too fast and too much, and who were ruining the national health and disposition by the great national disease "Americanitis"—which is hurry coupled with indigestion; a great complex, electrically driven, steam-heated, concentrated nation which needed a food simple enough for a child and nourishing enough for a strong man.

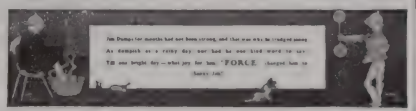
So I took the finest of wheat—the universal food since the world began—and the best of barley-malt and some salt, and with these three properly blended and cooked I made the food called "Force."

If you could come with me to Buffalo we would see the great mills where "Force" is prepared at the rate of one hundred thousand packages a day. You would watch the process that is changing a nation's habit of eating and at the same time changing its habit of thinking thereby.

How "Force" is Made

I USE only the finest wheat that can be grown; I see to it that it is made perfectly clean to begin with, and that it is kept clean all the time it is being made. When a boy washes his hands they are theoretically clean—but when a doctor washes his hands they are absolutely clean. "Force" is absolutely clean. Nowhere during its process from grain to package is it touched by anybody's hands.

There is some dirt in it when it comes to my mills—no real dirt—but just sand and dust from the fields. I take all this out by means of wonderful brushes and fans, by which the grains are freed not only from every speck of dirt, but from all dust as well. The old saying that one must eat his peck of dust during a lifetime may be true, but I have made up my mind that you shall get none of it from "Force."

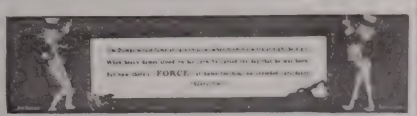


An extract of barley-malt is then prepared in which the wheat is soaked for from five to six hours. Some of the malt is absorbed by the wheat. Besides giving it a delicious flavor this does certain things to it which only a chemist can explain, but which means that it is partly digested.

After this malting it is cooked—very carefully and exactly—better than the cook at home could do it, for the heat is regulated by thermometers and clocks so that it will not cook too quickly, too much, or too little.

The wheat, when it leaves the cookers, is flavored with table salt.

It next travels mechanically to the polished steel rollers, where it is "flaked." The flaking changes each grainlet into a thin disc, in which form it passes to the "toasters," where it takes on the crispy form and delicate toast-brown appearance with which you are familiar.



From the toasters it passes through shutes which operate like the old-fashioned powder flasks, opening automatically and depositing in the waiting packages just enough of the dainty flakes to fill without crushing. These packages or cartons are quickly sealed in such a manner as to render them absolutely dust-proof, and then are packed, thirty-six at a time, in the wooden boxes which your grocer can hardly get fast enough.

These grocers have helped me a good deal in spreading the news of the new food. I guess there are about a quarter of a million of them in this country who supply their customers with the package that has my picture on it. This morning about two million people began the day right by having "Force" for breakfast, and felt superior because of it. Two million is a good many to cook for, but your own cook will tell you what a pleasure it is to have the folks fond of her cooking.

Fame and Its Defamers

THIS success of mine first excited envy and later strenuous competition from other makers of foods—nearly all of which are palpable imitations of "Force," imitations which, while they bear a general outer resemblance, are not "Force" or anything like it.

The sales of "Force" steadily increased until in every city in the United States they led over those of all other foods. Then the ordinary competition of advertising and good salesmanship gave way to an underhand method of attack, and one that was very hard to meet.

A rumor was circulated that "Force" contained some harmful ingredient. Foolish and preposterous as was this rumor, it gained ground, evidently because some people made it their duty to see that it was circulated.

I first tried to meet this malicious report quietly by the publication of analyses by chemists of the highest standing. Then I decided that the only way to kill a rumor was to fight it in the open.

I spent fifty thousand dollars in advertising throughout the whole country my offer of a reward of $5,000.00 each to any man, woman or child, to any professional chemist or private citizen, to any grocer or his customer, who could prove that there was anything in any package of "Force" bought in the open market but wheat, barley-malt and salt.

This offer has been published in nearly every newspaper in the United States. I will keep on publishing it until every one knows what I know—that "Force" is synonymous with absolute purity.

The point is that we are not simply offering proof that there is no harmful substance in "Force." We are proving that there is no substance in it that ought not to be there.

Some New "Force" Dishes

A book of dainty recipes, illustrated in many colors, describing dishes in which "Force" is a delicious ingredient, will be mailed to all who will send me a two-cent stamp with request. The list of "Force" dishes is being added to every day and I am always glad to receive recipes from housewives in order that I may include them in these "Force" books and pass them on to appreciative appetites everywhere.

The World's New Motto

The two words, "Be Sunny," shall be my text hereafter. I am going to show you that sunniness is more "worth while" than anything else; that just as soon as the body is freed from unnecessary drags upon it one begins to feel better—and so does everyone else in the neighborhood, that most of us are bowed down by bad or wrongly chosen foods, and that "Force" is the best food for everybody, every day—but particularly for you if you are not sunny.

Be Sunny.

Sunny Jim

"Force-Thoughts"

By SUNNY JIM

THE WORLD'S wise thinks right, lives right, and no woman thinks right who eats wrong.

The food you eat is either a help or a hindrance, and most people begin to fail when they begin to stumble over their own breakfast.

It's not a matter of food altogether. It is somewhat a matter of feeling, but you must have the food about which you can begin to think right, and that food is "Force."

A flake of "Force" is very small, but it has in it just the right things to carry a busy school teacher through a long day's work. From it that rosy-cheeked school-girl gets her joy of living. It puts the joyous note in the boy's whistle. To it you can trace that ring in the voice of the sophomore and the spring in the step of the senator.

It is just Power, in good form.

As you ate your dish of "Force" this morning, two million people ate with you, and the sunshine of the world was increased to that extent thereby.

"FORCE"

is the material expression of the world's new motto: "Be Sunny."

I'd like to send every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a copy of my new book.

It treats of two subjects: how to serve "Force" in many ways, and how to be sunny—always.

It is one of the most successful books of the year, for I've had to publish one million copies to supply the demand.

It contains a good many full page color plates showing how to prepare new dishes that tempt, and nourish, and taste good.

It's not all about "Force."

It contains a recipe for being happy that is meant for everyone who isn't as happy as she would like to be—a recipe so practical that everyone can use it perfectly. No, it's not just to "use 'Force'"—that only helps.

I mean really to be happy.

Questions and Answers

U. F., Albany, N. Y. 1. Is equivocation or prevarication ever justifiable? 2. Which is the most immoral, a bold lie, equivocation, or prevarication?

1. Judged in the strictest spiritual sense, nothing that deviates from the straight line of truth is really justifiable. Equivocation and prevarication are simply degrees of untruth. Evasion or silence might be the better refuge. We know that the world judges certain grades of untruth to be mild or harmless, but they are untruths notwithstanding. 2. It would depend altogether upon the circumstances of the case.

Subscriber, New York. Believing that God, in his infinite love and wisdom, grants only those petitions that are for our highest good, how can we have faith to believe that "whatsoever" things we ask for in prayer, believing we shall receive, since our very heart's desire might, if granted, be the worst thing which could happen to us?

"Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." In our prayers, we must not ask amiss—that is, ask for needless gifts, which are not essential to our happiness and which would be antagonistic to our spiritual growth. To pray for great wealth, or luxurious surroundings, or selfish indulgences would be out of harmony with the true spirit of prayer, and not in accord with the Divine will and purpose; but in all things that are necessary and proper we have the privilege of petition. We can take all our cares and anxieties, our privations, our sufferings and sorrows, to the great Hearer of prayer, with confidence that he will not only listen to our petitions, but will answer in the way that is best for us. (See Matt. 6: 31-34 and parallel passages).

Emma L., Bayonne, N. J. Do you receive gifts of money for Fresh-Air Fund?

Yes; $3 gives a child a ten-days' outing. You can endow a bed for the season for $21.

R. D., Newburg, N. Y. Human agency and human declarations will never set the world right. But the non-resistance doctrine is not new; it is at least as old as the Quakers. The same sect also declines to recognize the claims of princes and people of rank to superiority. The Shakers, too, are non-resistants. The strongest of all protests against kingly assumption is that contained in our own Declaration of Independence. We quite agree with you that the monarchical powers of the present day show little of the spirit of Christ, also that all war is sin, and that standing armies are a grievous burden on the people; but while human nature remains as it is, the same old offences against God will continue to arise. Nothing short of Omnipotence will effect the regeneration of the world. There is, we believe, a very large religious sect in Russia which is non-resistant. So, also, are the Mennonites, the Stundists, and others.

G. F. P., Scranton, Pa. Is it not impossible for two men to love the same woman, all being professing Christians?

Not impossible, certainly; indeed, it is very frequently the case. The lady may have several suitors; but as soon as she indicates her preference, the others, if they are honorable men, withdraw from the contest.

Teacher, Chicago, Ill. Where can I find all necessary information concerning the World's Sunday School Convention, next year, at Jerusalem?

Write to E. K. Warren, Chairman, Three Oaks, Mich., or to W. N. Hartshorn, Boston, Mass.

Rosina, Germantown, Pa. Yes; it is possible to be too severe in your rules for the children with respect to early rising. We imagine very few healthy boys spring out of bed the moment they awake. An authority gives these suggestions:

Don't jump up the first thing your eyes are open. While you sleep the vital organs are at rest. The vitality is lowered and the circulation not so strong. A sudden spring out of bed is a shock to these organs, especially to the heart, as it starts to pumping the blood suddenly. Notice how a baby wakes. It stretches its arms and legs, rubs its eyes and yawns and wakes up slowly. This is the natural way to wake up. A good yawn and a stretch are better than a cold bath.

Mrs. D. R., Belleville, N. J. What progress has been made in the movement against U. S. Senator Smoot? We have heard very little about it lately.

The National W. C. T. U. has sent to all its local Unions a remonstrance against allowing the Senator to retain his seat. This particular campaign has been wholly taken charge of by the W. C. T. U., and will probably be heard from during the coming winter.

Mrs. F. L. De F., Troy, N. Y. Who is the author of the expression—"Books are the windows from which the soul looks out?"

The nearest approach to it that we can find is in Dryden's essay on Dramatic Poetry, wherein he speaks of "The spectacles of books." Possibly some reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can supply the author's name.

Reader, York, Neb. Can you explain a passage that has puzzled me exceedingly? Does God send out evil spirits, as the writer of Samuel says (I. Samuel 16: 14) he sent to Saul?

Allowance must be made for the prevalence of ideas which the writer of the book had probably adopted from the philosophers of his time. There is, however, a sense in which such a phrase may be understood. Good may be changed to evil by the perversity of man, or by what we call accidents. We find electricity exceedingly useful in carrying our messages, giving us light and power; yet electricity will kill. Fire is a blessing in increasing our comfort, but it may burn the house. So God gives genius—one of his choicest gifts; yet it became a curse to such men as Byron and Voltaire. You would surely acknowledge that the genius came from God, but the men turned it to evil. Saul's affliction was the result of his envy, pride and jealousy. God has provided that those passions shall bring their own punishment. In that sense, probably, the writer intended his words to be understood.

Subscriber, Mill Creek, Pa. Where can I get one of the concert roller organs? I would like to have one. What is the price?

The price is $10 cash, or $12 by instalments. You can procure these organs of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Emma B., Lincoln, Neb. Am I right in stating that Charles Wesley was the author of the long metre doxology, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow?"

No. The author was Thomas Ken (1637–1711), who wrote a "Morning and Evening Hymn," in which the four universally-known lines occur.

A. H. C., Charleston, Ill. Your letter, containing some twenty questions, received. We regard it as altogether unreasonable for any one to foolishly sit down and multiply questions in this fashion. Many of them have already been answered in THE MAIL BAG from time to time; others are put apparently for the purpose of quibbling.

M. M., Baltimore, Md. 1. What are the relative sizes of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans? 2. What is the weight of a gallon of water?

1. The Pacific is three times the larger, and contains (estimated) 200,000,000,000,000 gallons. 2. A gallon of water weighs ten pounds.

Reader, Ridgewood, N. J. Of whom is it recorded truthfully that he broke all the commandments in one day?

The question is a "catch," and refers doubtless to Moses (see Exodus 32: 19), who broke the tables of the Law.

A. W., Springfield, O. How did the children of Israel obtain in the wilderness the gold and silver and other costly materials, which were given to Moses for the construction of the Tabernacle?

There would be, doubtless, opportunities even in their state of servitude in Egypt of accumulating property, which a Hebrew would be sure to improve, and it would naturally be turned into portable form. Besides this, and probably the chief source of the materials, would be the gifts of the Egyptians, on that night of panic, when they were almost driven out of Egypt. The Bible account is that the Egyptians "were urgent upon the people," being afraid that, unless they left quickly they would all be dead men. Our authorized version says that the Hebrews "borrowed" jewels of gold and silver and raiment, but the revised version renders it more correctly, "asked," probably as unpaid wages. Both versions agree that "they spoiled the Egyptians," implying that they obtained a considerable amount (See EX. 12: 32–36).

Inquirer, New York City. Yes; the question whether or not a clergyman can officiate at his own marriage was decided in the affirmative, in the case of Beamish vs. Beamish, in the Court of Queens Bench, Dublin, on Nov. 16, 1855.

Student, Alameda, Cal. In a recent issue you referred to the origin of the Rip Van Winkle myth. What was its origin?

Nearly every nation has a tradition of some sleeper, who, after a long period, will awake to accomplish some great deed. Thus, the seven sleepers of Ephesus slumbered 250 years on Mount Celion; and Charlemagne, Frederick Barbarosa, Olaf Trygvason, King Arthur and several others, are the subjects of similar legends. Irving simply applied the idea to the subject at hand.

Herman L., Newark, O., writes:

We read in the papers of the "great bags" made by Emperors William and Franz Joseph and King Edward. They are insignificant, however, compared with the record of the King of Naples (1798), who was reported in the German papers of that day to have killed in Austria, Bohemia and Moravia: 5 bears, 1,200 boars, 1,008 stags, 13 wolves, 354 foxes, 15,320 pheasants, 1,121 rabbits, 16,354 hares, 1,625 roebucks, and 12,435 partridges. What sort of a heart could this royal slaughterer have had?

Mrs. C. W. D., Proctor, Vt. Robert Burns wrote the poem in question.

Deafness Overcome

Louisville Man Originates a Simple Little Device that Instantly Restores the Hearing—Fits Perfectly, Comfortably and Does Not Show.

190-PAGE BOOK FREE TELLS ALL ABOUT IT

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube, or any such old fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf, and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is effective even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and, aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the least irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness in any person no matter how acquired, whether from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery, or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bonafide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station in life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device; you will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address for the free book and convincing evidence, Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1230 Todd building, Louisville, Ky., U. S. A.

PATERNAL RETRIBUTION

David's Sins Bear Fruit in Absalom's Death

By Mrs. M. Baxter

TWO messengers carried tidings to the king of the death of Absalom: Ahimaaz, by his own desire; Cushi, as the man selected by Joab. It is easy to see why Joab did not send Ahimaaz. He had not courage to tell the whole truth. His first word was the usual salutation, "Peace," and then he said, "Blessed be the Lord thy God, which hath delivered up the men that have lifted up their hand against my lord the King." But not a word about Absalom. When Cushi came, and the king put the same question to him, he answered, "The enemies of my lord the king, and all that rise against thee to do thee hurt, be as that young man is." And David knew his son was dead. Joab's object was gained.

David was no longer young; and the shock was a terrible one to him. All hope for Absalom's repentance was cut off, and he must realize that there was no hope. His own sin must have come up with overwhelming force, and no doubt the enemy drove him nearly to despair. His sin had made it easier for Absalom to sin. If he had not been disloyal to God, probably Absalom would not have been disloyal to him. Remorse of the most bitter kind would bring back to him his sad mistake in recalling from his banishment and reinstating Absalom in his favor, contrary to the law of God; and the enemy would lash him with one indictment after another, until the darkness became overwhelming. O how Satan can use against parents their many mistakes, and bring them in guilty of the sins of their children! How he can probe old wounds in the hearts of parents, and put on them a yoke of hopeless repentance and sorrow, which leads only to weakness, unless the Lord comes in with his light and life.

David was unbalanced; the blow had touched him in the weakest spot—his family. We must learn to take things in their right order.

It is one of the greatest hindrances to the conversion of our children when we let their claims upon us take precedence of the claims of God. We need, in order to really help our children, to have God on our side, and in order to this we need to stand on his side. Our children are blood-bought; God's claim on them is higher and more just than ours. How many parents have acted as though they must lay themselves out to please or to help their children—with money, with time, with love—without first knowing from the Lord in what way, with how much time, or how much money, they should help them.

It was a bitter cry, that cry of David. One who did not know the Lord as David knew him could not have understood the poignancy of his grief. "Evil out of thine own house." Was this deserved judgment never to cease? Was his sin to be ever before him? Was he to see soul and body of child after child fall under the curse of his sin, and die without hope? For the time it seemed as though every other consideration must give way—the grief was more than he could bear. It was a critical moment for Israel; but under the shock of Absalom's death, David seemed to be unconscious of it; and he ran the risk of losing the kingdom as well as his son. Things were coming to a crisis. The victory that day was turned into mourning unto all the people, for the people heard say that day how the king was grieved for his son. They had fought loyally and well; there had been great loss of life; but the king did not come out to welcome them—they had no word of encouragement: they might as well have joined Absalom, some might have thought. "they came into the city by stealth, as people being ashamed when they flee in battle"; and they ran the risk of becoming demoralized when the king took no notice of them, and from the room over the gate they heard only the loud, bitter cry, "O my son Absalom! O Absalom, my son, my son!"

FRUIT AND NUTS AS FOOD

OR some time past the Department of Agriculture at Washington has been conducting a series of experiments to determine the dietary value of different foods. The experiments were conducted during the space of two years by Prof. Jaffa, of the University of California. Nine dietary studies and thirty-one digestion experiments were carried on. In the majority of the dietary studies, and all but one of the digestion experiments, fruit and nuts constituted all or almost all of the diet. The results of the investigation emphasize the fact that both fruit and nuts should be considered as true foods rather than food accessories. The subjects were two women, three children, two elderly men, and two university students. The men all did hard manual labor during a part of the time, the students working to support themselves while pursuing their studies.

The fare given in these experiments was in every case one that would appeal to any normal appetite. It embraced honey, potatoes, apples, bananas, cantaloupe, grapes, Cherdal, cornichon, tokay, muscat, scarlet haws, pears, pomegranates, persimmons, oranges, strawberries, watermelons, figs, almonds, and peanut butter. The only animal foods allowed were cottage cheese and eggs, and these in limited quantities. The cost of such a diet varied from 15 to 18 cents a day. Comparative experiments were carried along in which animal foods were employed under the usual conditions of living, and in these the daily cost ran from 26 to 30 cents. It was found that the food eaten supplied about 60 per cent. of the protein usually secured by the average meat diet, while health and strength continued the same, if not improved, and in two or three cases there was a slight gain in flesh and weight.

One of the chief objects of the series of experiments was to furnish data as to the value of nuts as food. Fruits contain little protein, and nuts are relied on in the fruitarian plan of eating to balance the ration. Fruits are rich in carbo-hydrates and nuts in fat. A pound of peanuts, which cost 7 cents, furnishes 1,000 calories of energy at a cost of 3½ cents, and protein at a cost of 36 cents a pound. A porterhouse steak costs for the same result, respectively, 22½ cents and $1.31, when the steak can be bought for 25 cents a pound. The average price per pound of the protein of nuts ranges higher than the corresponding average of meats, but the cost per pound of peanut protein is lower than for meats, fish, eggs, milk, dairy products, and prepared cereals. The only foods which furnish protein at a less cost than peanuts are flour and dried beans. According to Prof. Jaffa's experiments, nuts are the cheapest source of energy for the fruitarian, the peanut ranging far ahead of any other variety.

Although peanuts supply protein and energy for a smaller sum than bread, they are outranked by dried beans, which, at 5 cents a pound, will supply for 10 cents over 200 grams of protein and 3,040 calories of energy.

Baby-Skin–

NO fine lady or grown-up girl has the velvety skin like a baby —not quite.

Haven't you seen a girl or woman catch sight of a dainty baby, and, if publicity does not forbid, rush to the little stranger, and go into raptures over its pink and softness?

That's the charm of baby-skin; not of the baby.

Every woman, or man, wants, in proper measure, a baby-skin. Let them use PEARS' SOAP, which is nothing but soap; pure soap; which is nothing but PEARS'.

Most soaps but PEARS' have excessive alkali in them.

We all have a baby-skin, unless it is eaten away by alkali. Nothing but soap will find it. It may be well disguised—PEARS' SOAP will find it.

The Paper that Backs up the Books

The restless mind of a boy requires more reading than his school books supply. Select the best for him and he will not select the worst for himself.

The best magazine in the world for boys is THE AMERICAN BOY. A year's issues contain 400 large pages, with over 1000 high-grade illustrations. It touches boy life at every angle, feeds a boy's expanding mind with digestible facts and healthy fiction, makes study more attractive and play more interesting. Boys say it is "good all through."

As an indication of the good things in store for readers of THE AMERICAN BOY, glance at this list of a few of its well-known contributors: Harriet Prescott Spofford, Hezekiah Butterworth, Kirk Munroe, General Charles King, Edward S. Ellis, W. Murray Graydon, J. L. Harbour, Gabrielle E. Jackson, Will H. Lisenbee, J. Oliver Curwood, Mattie M. Boteler, Frank H. Sweet, Crittenden Marriott, L. R. Gignilliat, Joseph Blethen, Waldon Fawcett, Joel Chandler Harris, J. C. Beard, Julia K. Hildreth, James Buckham, William Pendleton Chipman, D.D.; Fred Myron Colby, Robert N. Reeves.

Beginning with December, THE AMERICAN BOY will publish a continued story by Kirk Munroe, for which $1000 has been paid. Six months later another story by the same favorite author will begin, the price of which was likewise $1000. These are stories of travel, the materials for which were gathered by Mr. Monroe on his recent trip around the world.

The managing editor of THE AMERICAN BOY has just returned from Europe with a host of new ideas which he will work out to interest the boy readers of his paper. Many foreign story writers for boys have been engaged, and many pictures have been taken of interesting things in Europe for the entertainment of American boys.

THE AMERICAN BOY has partially completed arrangements for a system of international correspondence between boys in all parts of the world. Readers of THE AMERICAN BOY have a treat in store for them as a result of the editor's trip abroad during the past summer.

THE AMERICAN BOY is the organ of the Order of the American Boy, a non-secret organization with an immense fellowship all over the country, devoted to social life among boys and the development of manliness in muscle, mind and morals. It is likewise the organ of the Lyceum League of America.

THE AMERICAN BOY

Makes a specialty of telling boys how to do things. It preaches the gospel of "do," not "don't." It publishes short stories and serials of a high grade, all interesting, some thrilling, but none of the "blood and thunder" kind. It publishes regularly: What Boys are Doing; Boys as Money Makers; Boys in Home, Church and School; Boys in Office, Store, Factory and on the Farm; the Boy Photographer; the Boy Journalist; Boys in Games and Sports; the Boy Orator; the Boy Coin, stamp and Curio Collector; the Boy Scientist and Inventor; How to make Things; the Puzzle Page.

For One Dollar

we will send THE AMERICAN BOY for the entire year of 1904 and furnish the October, November and December issues in 1903 FREE. Everyone subscribing now will receive a free copy of the greatest boy picture ever painted by Adam Emory Albright, the famous artist of American boy life. This, his latest work, is entitled, "On the Village Green," showing two boys in the attitude of batter and catcher at baseball. It is sure to be a striking and favorite ornament for a boy's room. Size of picture 11x15 inches.

MISS ALICE ROOSEVELT
Photographed in Porto Rico

A PORTO RICAN WOMAN

THE Americanization of Porto Rico

Causes that Retard its Progress — What it Needs to Become Happy and Prosperous

OUR little Island possession of Porto Rico is passing through an interesting experience. What with a railroad being built across the island, which will connect San Juan and Ponce; the arrival of Secretary Hartzell and Dr. Lindsay as delegates of the coffee-growers; the liberal investing of capital by Americans in lands and other enterprises, and last, but not least, the work of the missionaries and schools, Porto Rico may yet get out of the rut it has fallen into, and in the near future enjoy a degree of prosperity.

The island's resources are entirely agricultural, and as its products far exceed what is necessary for home consumption, the surplus must find a market, which naturally, should be the United States. To bring crops from Cayey to the shipping point, San Juan, takes not less than sixty hours, for the road is extremely hilly, and the only motive power a slow "bull team." The proposed railroad across the island will tap the richest soil. A franchise to build the railroad has been granted by the Executive Council of Porto to Americans, and the latter have deposited $200,000 in bonds to guarantee the completion of the road. It will run from San Juan to Rio Piedras, Caguas, Cayey, Guayama, Coamo, Ponce, and Ponce Playa. Along this route are rich coffee estates, sugar properties and fruit groves.

In the building of this road great engineering difficulties present themselves. There are steep hillsides to be crossed—many with grades of sixty degrees. Torrential rains wash away the work and involve much rebuilding. The construction of this railroad will cost about $3,000,000. The total length of the road is about ninety miles. It is being built by American engineers, though a few Porto Ricans, too, are employed. The manual labor is entirely native. The motive power will be electricity, which will be generated at Comeria Falls. It will be a trolley road. This new line, however, will not be the only one in the island, for there is a narrow guage steam road owned by the American Railroad Company (a French corporation) between San Juan and Ponce, skirting the sea-coast, and touching the principal cities on the north and west shores.

Porto Rican coffee growers have formed an association, to regulate the sale and handling of coffee, so that it will conform to the American requirements, and also to find markets. When Spain ruled the island, it was a big buyer of Porto Rican coffee; but after the close of the war it withdrew its patronage. This loss was a heavy one, as the United States did not buy coffee as liberally as the Spanish had done. In 1901–1902, the shipments of coffee to the United States were $29,188, and to foreign countries, $3,168,662. Porto Rico formerly shipped nearly $11,000,000 worth of coffee annually. The average yield approximates 26,000 tons annually. Before American occupation, this coffee commanded a price of about fifteen cents a pound. To-day Porto Rican coffee goes begging in the American market at seven or eight cents, and Europe, formerly a heavy buyer, takes but a small percentage of its former purchases. European countries have tariffs, which discriminate against American products, and Porto Rican coffee suffers accordingly. The planters have requested Secretary Hartzell, and Dr. Lindsay, the Commissioner of Education of Porto Rico, to present their case at Washington, and secure for them such relief as is necessary.

Five years of American occupation have done little to alter the essentially Spanish proclivities of Porto Rico's inhabitants. When a people, day after day, for four hundred years, do the same things, think the same things, and see the same things, a mere change of government cannot quickly upset traditions which have been so long a-making.

Spain, so most people believe, governed its dependencies tyrannically. It is not the purpose of the writer to question that belief: he has simply to deal with results. A retrospective view of the condition of the Porto Rican people will show, that if they were cruelly or harshly dealt with, they were nevertheless contented—at least, not dissatisfied. The officials who represented the Court of Castile in the island committed great wrongs; they stole money, and made themselves rich at the expense of the people. Their pilferings were so divided that the burden did not fall too heavily on specific individuals; the Insular Treasury was the sufferer. True, there were cases of rich men made poor overnight to satisfy the greed of some individual; but these cases, on the other hand, did not affect all the people. All things considered, Spain's rule of Porto Rico did not work a too great hardship on the island, and the people, as a whole, were more or less content. And this content spread itself over the four hundred years that the Spanish ruled Porto Rico.

Spanish colonists, filled with the glowing reports of this "Paradise of the Antilhes," came to the island, settled there, and married Porto Rican women. They introduced Spanish thought and ideas. The poorer class took up the native habits, lived in thatch houses and became dirty and indolent. This intermarrying bore its fruit—a race of half-Spanish, half-Indian people, whose language was Spanish, whose customs were Spanish, whose thought was Spanish, and whose religion was Catholic—the Church of Spain.

This union of Spaniard and Porto Rican created a type whose chief characteristic was laziness. Whether this laziness has a genealogical or climatic foundation matters not. It exists, and therein is to be found the reason that the Americanization of the island has hardly begun.

The planter has little knowledge of modern methods of cultivation. He does not irrigate, he does not drain, he does not replenish the soil, he does not conserve the water. He uses implements so ancient that our "oldest settlers" could not remember them. A cannery which would put up pineapples, guava jelly and other tropical fruits, would reap a rich harvest. Cotton will grow in Porto Rico, but there are no mills. Sugar is the only line in which any manufacturing has been attempted; yet nothing was done till Americans took hold of the industry. Now the manufacture of sugar is entirely in American hands.

Haste is abhorrent to a Porto Rican. No matter how urgent a business matter may be, he will not be hurried. It takes hours to close a trade which, with us, would take only minutes. A friend of the writer went into a large saw-mill in San Juan one day just before noon. He wanted to place a large order for lumber. He was told: "Venga pues mas tarde. Voy a comer ahora." (Come a little later. I am going to eat now); and though in a hurry for the lumber the Porto Rican dealer would not do any business until he had eaten.

Go into a cafe. A slovenly waiter will come to you sneaking, and ask you for your order. He will return with your coffee and cake in five minutes, maybe in half an hour. So it is in everything. The people take their time and are never in a hurry. Mananna (to-morrow) is time enough to do everything, why do it to-day?

Since the American occupation, San Juan, Mayaquez, Ponce, and Arecibo have made great strides in sanitation. All of these cities now have sewers and water-works. Guayama, Humacao and other towns are preparing to follow their example. In education, too, the Americans have done much for the island. Every city, town and hamlet now has its schoolhouse, where American teachers train the native youth. A few short years must witness a remarkable change as the result of this training. At the present time the island is spending $800,000 annually on education. It has laid the foundations for the University of

The Rich Widow

TEXT—LUKE 7: 12:

"AND SHE WAS A WIDOW"

THE Rich Widow! Who ever heard of such a title for a sermon on this text? Better call her "The Poor Widow," "The Friendless Widow," "The Hopeless Widow," "The Dying Widow"—anything, but "The Rich Widow." This funeral procession winding its way out of the Syrian city, is one of the most pathetic spectacles of the Gospel history. How much heart-break is contained in those three phrases: "A dead man; the only son of his mother; and she was a widow!" In Arizona is a mountain aptly named "Starvation Peak." There the Indians, many decades ago, drove the Spaniards and hemmed them in, and kept them, until, for the want of food, the little band of living men were changed into a band of decomposing corpses. So this text is one of the "Starvation Peaks" among the Gospel Hills. It is the place where a wife first lost her husband, her bread-winner. Then it is the place where, during the struggle of widowhood, the mother had raised her boy so that he could be her support in her declining years. And now a wife without her husband, and a mother with only a cold body for her son, is slowly wending her way to the cemetery. She was a wife and a mother only of the grave. "The Rich Widow?" Nonsense! Change the title. Call the caption "The Poor Widow of Starvation Peak."

No, my brother, I want to keep the title I have chosen. I want to show how even a woman so desolate as the one in the text may find consolation in life; and in the performance of her duty and in the sympathy of humanity, and more than all in the resources of Divine power, her life may become rich for herself and for others. I have seen too many adjectives hitched to this heroic and conquering nominative. I believe thousands and tens of thousands of mothers who have been bereft of the companion who once stood with them at the marriage altar, have attained

True and Abiding Wealth

They have been rich in all that makes life truly happy, great and good. Rich in their opportunities to do a double service in life. To their children, they have become father as well as mother. Rich in their inspiring examples of duties well done. Rich in the faith with which their trials led them to test the goodness and greatness of God. Rich in the heights and depths and lengths and breadths of their love. And, above all, rich in eternal as well as temporal rewards. It is in order to gather a few "blue-bells" from off the graves of the dead husbands and fathers that I preach this sermon. I would ring these floral trophies in a great pæan of praise that the widows, the numberless widows of the present day, who are facing the battle of life alone, might renew their strength, and go on winning victory after victory for themselves, their little ones, and for Christ.

The widow is rich in her opportunities of maternal usefulness; rich, because all the physical, mental and spiritual resources of her nature are developed in the struggle which her loneliness involves. Rich, because for her children every word she speaks, and every thought she thinks, and every deed she performs shall bring forth their maximum of results for good or evil. For her offspring, every mountain which she has to climb can become a gold mine, and every thicket into which she has to plunge, a bank of roses; and every shower of tears can return as a tossing, tumbling fountain, and every land for her can become a harvest-field of yellow grain, or of white-cheeked, sweet-scented clover tops. Literally, by taking away a wife's husband, God makes it possible for a widow with children to make more out of her life, in a maternal sense, than in any other way. At once, by the mere fact of widowhood, she becomes the father, the mother, the bread-winner, the guide, and the all-in-all for her offspring.

Now, everyone should want to make the most out of their lives. Therefore, oh! widow, ought you not feel honored because God has singled you out as one of his favorite daughters for great and vital work. We stand upon Little Round Top, on the battlefield of Gettysburg, and look with pride at the monument erected there to the memory of Major-General Gouverneur Warren. At that critical point he saved the Federal lines from being cut in twain by the Confederate forces. With the keen eye of a military engineer, he saw that Little Round Top was the one spot about which the mortal struggle of Lee and Meade must be finally decided. And so, upon his own authority, he entrenched those heights, and perhaps then and there saved the unity of our Republic, which now stretches from sea to sea. Shall you not feel to-day, oh! widow, that as General Warren was chosen to stand on Little Round Top and save the Federal government, so God has placed you on the Little Round Top of your husband's grave to save your home? A few years ago, the United States—North, East, South and West—united its many voices in praising the greatest of American jurists, John Marshall, who, year after year, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, rendered the decisions which made it possible for the United States Government at Washington to be what it is to-day. Shall you, oh! widow, not feel honored, in the same way, as we honor John Marshall, since God has placed you in a position where your children and your children's children, may be moulded and started forth into Christian usefulness by the consecration and faithfulness of your life? You who have gone out to weep over your husband's grave, I beg and plead with you not to consider your life a poverty-stricken one. In the glorious opportunities which have come to you in reference to your children, you are rich! You are magnificently and gloriously rich. God has made you sole guardian of your little ones.

Double Opportunity

Oh, the paternal, as well as the maternal opportunities which are offered to the consecrated Christian widowhood of the present century! Some time ago, a beautiful faced lady was going through one of the great department stores in Columbus, O. She saw there a large-eyed, wistful-looking cash boy, who was watching her and her son. "My child," said she, "would you like to go home and be my little boy? There you could have money and playthings, and horses and carriages to make your life happy, as my little boy's life is happy?" "I do not know, mum, whether I would like those things or not," he answered. "Has your little boy a papa? If I go with you, will his papa be my papa? I want a papa. Because, mum, before my papa died, I had all those things, and now that my papa is dead, I have nothing." Ah, yes, there was pathos, unfathomable pathos in the answer of the little cash boy. But that answer is not true in reference to all fatherless children. When their fathers died, they did not all lose everything. Their mothers, not only remained their mothers, but they became their fathers also. O, woman, who art a widow, I sympathize with you in your sorrow and your hard lot; but let me congratulate you, too, on the opportunity God has placed within your reach of honorably and heroically performing a double duty. In a paternal as well as in a maternal sense, you are accomplishing much for the temporal and the eternal lives of your children.

The consecrated widow is rich in the kindnesses and sympathies which are shown to her by her friends and neighbors. Rich, because the chalice of sorrow which is placed at the lip is not entirely filled with acidities and bitternesses and unsavory nux vomicas; but it is also saccharined and nectared with the helpful sympathy of her friends which mingles in her cup of woe.

The Kindnesses of the Street

It is amazing how many kindnesses there are in this world, if only one stops to catalogue them. You can see those kindnesses manifested everywhere. A few years ago, a man was caught in the crowd that surged into the cars of the Brooklyn Bridge. He was jammed this way and that. His hat was battered and crushed. The more he vehemently denounced the people as savages, the more he was hustled and pushed along. When he was at last seated and was still complaining, a gentleman next to him turned and said: "My friend, I am afraid that you have got into the condition of only looking upon the bad side of human nature. Now, I have schooled myself to look upon the good side. And to help me in my task of looking upon the bright side, every day I carry a notebook and jot down every good thing I see people do to other people. For instance, to-day, on my way to the bridge, my hat blew off. I chased it; but before I could get it, three other men whom I had never seen before ran after that hat. One of them caught it and brought it back to me. Now, that action was certainly unselfish. And yet you can see the same unselfish act performed on any windy day.

"As I was crossing City Hall Park," he continued, "a woman in front of me lost her glove. Two newsboys saw it and ran to get it for her. That certainly was unselfish. On my way down Broadway, a truckman's horse fell. Immediately the drivers of three other trucks stopped their horses to help the man who was in difficulty. That also was unselfish. These are but little things; but everywhere you will see men and women doing just such kind things to their neighbors. When this car stops, you will see four or five gentlemen take their papers and give them to the newsboys for them to sell them over again. All these facts certainly sh that the human race is not a collection of savag My friend, you had better look upon the bright si of human nature, and not dwell upon the dark side."

The sermon which the Christian gentleman preach in the cable car of the Brooklyn Bridge is certainly tr Everywhere one can see many kindnesses manifest towards those who are in distress, if those people distress are worthy of human kindness. And so, wide though you may have had your bumps and knocks, that indignant passenger had who was trying to g into the train; though you may have had injustic practiced upon you, for thieves and murderers fr time immemorial have always felt that widows a orphans were their legitimate prey, you have also h many kindnesses shown you and yours. In old Engli folk-lore, there was supposed to be in Alderley Edge great cavern. And in this cavern was concealed, sa the legend, nine hundred and ninety and nine horseme equipped and ready to come forth and fight for a leader who would blow for them the right bugle-ca No sooner did your husband die, and the cemetery b had tolled the knell when his body was carried to l last resting-place, than that bell seemed to call for hundreds of helpers to your side, from recesses as da as the caverns of Alderley Edge. Every true and fait ful widow always gathers around her faithful friends.

Love Born of Sacrifice

The consecrated widow is rich in the heights ar depths and intensities of the love she bears towar those who are dependent upon her. It is one of th inevitable laws of this world that we generally value a article just in proportion to what it is worth to us. If costs nothing, we care for it but little. If it costs muc we value it much. I enter your home. You show m the results of your travels. You say, "This is a rug bought in Damascus. Here is a beautiful piece o ivory I found in India. Here is a boomerang of Au tralia. Yonder is a trinket I picked up in Pompei But this picture is my treasure. It was painted by Spanish master, and was placed upon the walls of Mexican cathedral. One night, that picture was c out of its frame and carried away, as "Dolly" Madiso ordered George Washington's picture to be cut out o its frame, when the English invaded the National Cap tol in 1812. That picture must be worth at least $20,00 I paid $10,000 for it. Yes, I value that picture abov all my other possessions. It cost me so much money.

But though the value of some articles may be judge by the criterion of silver and gold, others are some times judged by the higher standard of flesh and bloo If, in order to save your country, you had to sacrific upon the field of battle an arm, or a leg, or an eye, woul you not, on account of, that sacrifice, love your countr more than if, like John Jacob Astor, you merely made t it the gift of an artillery battery, or like old Corneliu Vanderbilt, you fitted out for it a man-of-war? If i order to save your child who had been gripped with th poisonous bite of a dangerous serpent, you had placed your mouth against the bleeding lips of the wound an sucked that poison into your own system, would yo not love that child more for whom you were willing t imperil your life, than if you had given to her a mer offering of silver and gold? Yes! Yes! Of course yo would. The law is universal. The greater the sacri fices we make for our loved ones, the greater become our love for them.

An Amputated Arm

This premise is granted. Where then can you find richer, deeper, truer sacrifices, and therefore richer love, than that exhibited by a widowed mother towards her helpless children? Tenderly as you and I love our children, does our love glow with such fervent heat as does that of the widowed mother who has toiled and contrived, and denied herself for their welfare? In order to raise them, she has to pay for their education and food with the price of blood. Does not that young girl's graduation day address mean more to her mother, who, perhaps, had to scrub for it, as well as sew together the white dress in which it was delivered? During the Civil War, a soldier boy's arm was amputated. After the lad came out from under the influence of the anæsthetic, he asked the surgeon if he might see his arm. The nurse handed it to him. The boy looked the arm over very carefully, as he said: "Good-bye, old arm. You have been a good friend to me. Those fingers have worked for me very hard." Then turning, he said to the surgeon: "Doctor, do not think I am a coward, or that I regret the sacrifice. If necessary, I would cut off my other arm to save my country. I never Porto Rico. A fine normal school is now operated under the University Trustees, from which are to be graduated the future teachers of the Porto Rican children.

Our missionaries are contributing their full share toward the enlightenment of the people. The recently opened church at Catano, a suburb of San Juan, has a large native membership, and every Sunday is crowded. Rev. Dr. Richards is the pastor. Bishop Van Buren is busy with the erection of an Episcopal Home in Rio Piedras, the funds for which were collected in the United States. All the American ministers preach sermons to the natives in their own tongue, and do a great deal of good both in a spiritual and in a philanthropic way.

A study of the vital statistics of the island reveals the fact, that of 60,000 deaths, anemia was the direct cause in 18,500 cases. These figures were for the two years from June 1, 1900, to June 30, 1902. The health report of February, 1903—an average month—show that of a total of 1,894 deaths, 486 were due to anemia—lack of nourishment, or, in plainer words, slow starvation. People all over the island are starving. The natives have no work, because farms are idle; and these are idle because Porto Rican products have no markets. The general health of the island, however, is good, the death rate being about 23.2 per thousand. Consumption and pneumonia are responsible for many deaths in Porto Rico. These are induced by the carelessness of the laborers, who, after working in the fields all day under the tropical sun, and when covered with perspiration, seek the shade of some tree or house to cool off. The colds thus caught in this way are the foundation of lung troubles. These three diseases—anemia, consumption and pneumonia—account for nine-tenths of the deaths in Porto Rico. There is no small-pox or yellow fever, and little leprosy. It can be truthfully said, that under proper conditions, there is no more healthy place in the world than Porto Rico.

As an agricultural country the island is simply wonderful, its soil being the richest in the world. "Porto Rico," is the Spanish for rich port, and the island fully justifies the name given it by its discoverers. Coffee, sugar, tobacco, cotton and tropical fruits abound. If the planters had money enough to cultivate their farms, there would be no starvation in Porto Rico. The planters lost all in the hurricane of 1899, and they have never quite recovered from their loss. Then, in addition to this, Porto Rican products have no market, for the United States does not buy the coffee or other things the island raises. That is the chief reason for the lack of prosperity in Porto Rico. With a change for the better in the matter of trade market facilities, the people would quickly become prosperous and happy.

THE RICH WIDOW

knew what it truly meant to love my flag, until I bespattered it with my own blood." So, O widow, by your very sacrifices, I see with what intensity you love your children, because of the self-denial and the toil you have given them. By the very sacrifices which you have made for their physical, intellectual and spiritual development, I congratulate you upon the heights and depths and intensities of your maternal affections. It is one joy to plant a garden within a stone wall inclosure for your own eyes to see. It is a greater and a holier happiness to plant a flower garden that others may enjoy also.

The consecrated widow is rich, because she has been able, by personal experience, to prove the certainty and faithfulness of God's promises. A life-boat is sometimes used as a pleasure craft along the shores of Massachusetts and Long Island. You can see the fishermen take and rig in it a small sail, and go spinning over the waters, while they laugh and joke as they draw in the bluefish, or the shad. So people sometimes use the Gospel life-boat merely for a pleasure craft. When the sky is clear and the sea smooth, they set sail for a frolic. But oh, my friends, the life-boat is a far different craft when, on a stormy night, the life-saving men launch it into the surf, to fight their way out to the ship aground in the offing, where it is being shattered to pieces by the ceaseless bombardments of the mighty seas. And the promises of God, out of which the Gospel life-boat is made, mean far more to a widowed mariner sailing the seas of life alone than they do to the young daughter, who has always been shielded from every storm. And yet, mother, I would ask you a pertinent question, which I know you will answer well. Though you may have buried your husband many years ago, was there ever a time when, if you trusted in God, his love and protection and care failed you? Was there ever a time when Christ was not willing to stand by the cradle of your living child, as in olden times he once stood by the bier of one who was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow?

Oh, the blessed enjoyment of having had the opportunity of fully testing the love and care and the gentleness of a protecting God! Many years ago, at a large infidel meeting in England, at which Charles Bradlaugh, the noted English agnostic, was speaking, an old, gray-haired woman arose. As she looked about her, she slowly said to the speaker, "Sir, it is very easy for you to attack the Best Friend I ever had. You do not know Him as I know Him. He came into my life many years ago. I once knew Him merely as an acquaintance; but after my husband died, He was more to me than an acquaintance, He was a friend, a Bloodfriend. Sir, that Friend helped me to feed and clothe my babies. That Friend gave me physical strength to go on when I thought I must die. That Friend, sir, is my dear Saviour. That is what my Christ has done for me. Now, sir, what has your infidelity been able to do for you?" O, mother, bereft of your husband, it has been a blessed opportunity for you to test the greatness and goodness of God. Do not tell me you are poor. You are rich. Rich hemispherically, and celestially rich. Rich, as God is rich.

But though in a divine sense the consecrated widow is rich, yet she shall be far richer in the next world. Woman, whom have you loved of all human beings the best on earth? "Well," you say, "that is a hard question to answer. I loved my mother and father in one way, and my children in another way, and my sisters and brothers in another way, and my school friends in another way. But, taking it all in all, I think I loved my husband best, truly best. We were one in thought, one in life, and one in everything. My one ambition in life was to please him." Yes, I think your answer is correct. The relations between a husband and a wife are so close that you were one, and your one desire was to live for him and to please him. Now, my sister bereft of her husband, when you reach heaven and meet the long separated father of your babies, do you not feel he will be pleased to know how you have worked and slaved for his flesh and blood? When you reach heaven, will you not be rich in the knowledge that he appreciates all you have done for your children and his? When one of my aunts—a widow—was dying, she looked up at those gathered about her bedside and said: "Now, I hope your father, Steven, will be satisfied with what I have done for his children." Yes, yes woman, your husband will truly be satisfied. You have done your task well. It has been a hard journey to travel alone. But at the end of the journey you will be rich in his blessing, as well as that of your Saviour.

Most of us know what the rapture of an earthly reunion means; but such a welcome will pale into insignificance before the heavenly embrace of a risen father and a long separated wife. After the famous battle of Five Forks, General George E. Pickett at Gettysburg fame was reported to have been killed. Day after day, his wife sat with her baby in her arms in the silence of despair. But one day, there rode up the lane of the Virginia home a familiar figure. He reined in his horse, "Whoa, Lucy! Whoa!" With that the mother, with a wild cry of joy, arose and said, "George! George! Is that you?" "I do not know how to describe it," wrote Mrs. Pickett, "the peace, the bliss of that moment! It was too deep, and too sacred to be translated into words." And so, my widowed friend, when in the heavenly reunion, you shall greet your dear one, carrying with you your children and his, the sacredness of that moment will be too deep and holy to be translated into words.

Thus, widows of Nain, and widows of Europe and America, and widows wherever you may be, I call you rich. Go about bravely and truly, tackling the battles that are before you. Christ shall be your partner in this world. Your rewards for duties well done await you in the next. The truest way for you to be true to your dead husband is for you to be true to the world's tasks God has given to you to do here. Remember that Christ knows all about a widow's troubles. He sympathized with the sorrowing widow of Nain. In his great heart there is sympathy for all who struggle and suffer, and the Divine help and consolation are found more generously bestowed than upon those who lose that truest of human bereavements—motherhood. His love, and all the blessings it brings, will make you rich indeed.

COLONISTS STACKING ALFALFA HAY

THE BUFFALO CANAL, AMITY

A BUNCH OF LIVE STOCK AT AMITY

THE COLONIZATION OF THE WEST

BY COMMANDER BOOTH-TUCKER

OUT of a population of 76,000,000 less than 10,000,000 occupy the vast and fertile territory west of Kansas City. A great impetus has been given to the colonization of these Western States by the personal interest taken by President Roosevelt in the question of immigration. His intimate knowledge of the history and requirements of the West, his residence there and frequent visits, have enabled him to speak with an authority which has commanded the attention of the entire nation. Through the weight of his influence important legislation, which would ordinarily have occupied years for consideration, has been railroaded through Congress at express speed.

IN THE AMITY SHOPPING DISTRICT

Some 2,500 engineers are already at work elaborating plans for the scientific subjugation of Arid America. It is calculated that in due course 100,000,000 acres of rich irrigated lands will be brought into cultivation, capable of supporting a population of not less than 30,000,000 persons from an agricultural point of view, apart altogether from industrial pursuits.

To secure, however, the complete success of this noble enterprise, it is essential that systematic colonization should go hand-in-hand with irrigation. The usual automatic processes will not be found suitable in the present case.

IN THE CHERRY-TREE HOME

Systematic colonization, like systematic irrigation, will, it is true, involve the expenditure of large sums of money. But it is difficult to imagine a safer or more profitable investment, from any standpoint.

The average value per acre of these western lands, so soon as water can be applied, and before they have been otherwise improved, is not less than twenty dollars. When families have been settled on the same in fifty-acre farms, with cottage, barn, live-stock, and other equipment, the minimum value is at least fifty dollars per acre. Thus a forty-acre farm occupied will be worth at least $2,000.

A COLONIST'S HOME

Now, to select and locate a suitable family would cost on an average about $500, apart from the value of the land, and this would include the above equipment. The security for the outlay would be ample, in the rapid increase of land values.

It may be asked, however, why the land should not be left open to colonists and settlers of the ordinary type? The answer is:

1. The man without money would thereby be excluded, though he forms, if carefully selected, the most desirable settler.

2. The land would be largely occupied either by speculators, who would hold it for future rise, or by dummy homesteaders, who would transfer it to large corporations.

3. At best, the haphazard system of automatic colonization is slow, and the land is not settled with the rapidity which is necessary to meet the heavy expenses of irrigation. Thus the working expenses of a canal that watered 100,000 acres would be comparatively light if the entire area could be simultaneously occupied; but the burden would become intolerable if only 10,000 acres should be taken up, or if the area should be occupied by speculators and dummies who had no intention of making the place their permanent home.

Now, by means of systematic colonization, the settlers could be carefully organized, drilled, and marched with strategic precision to the various districts, which had been previously prepared for their advent by the labors of the irrigation engineer. Thus the congestion of our cities could be relieved, thousands of families could be turned into happy home owners, tax-creators could be turned into tax-producers, a home-market could be provided for the consumption of our manufactures, the tide of immigration could be diverted from city to country, our beautiful Western States could be populated, and our abandoned farms in the East could again be systematically brought into cultivation. With such enormous advantages to be gained, is it too much to expect that our Government should itself take up this question and provide the necessary funds? It may be argued that colonization is a proper subject for private enterprise. But up to the present time, private enterprise has resolutely refused to touch the landless man and place him upon the manless land. It has confined itself entirely to the man with money, and refused to give the moneyless but worthy family a chance. Hence, if the Government does not undertake the work, it will be left undone, or will be confined to small and desultory efforts, which do not count for much. Moreover, such Governmental action would undoubtedly afford a great impetus to private enterprise and philanthropy.

THE COLONY DRY-GOODS STORE

Again, it may be objected that such action would savor of paternalism. But would not the same argument be equally applicable to education? If we insist on supplementing private enterprise and philanthropy in a realm where these are prepared to spend millions upon millions of dollars annually, why should we neglect the equally important question of colonization?

A COLONIST'S COTTAGE AND ORCHARD

Again, what is the palpable effect of our non-paternalism? To deliver over this magnificent patrimony to those who are, comparatively-speaking, well-to-do, while those who need it most are excluded! Why should ten million dollars be yearly spent from the national revenues in creating a valuable estate for those who are already well fixed, or for a horde of speculators, land-grabbers and their dummies, when the expenditure of a portion of this money will insure the occupation of the land by those who would live on it and cultivate it?

COL. HOLLAND'S HOUSE

In common justice, it would seem that the least that should be done is to form reservations, which shall be exclusively colonized with worthy but poor families. The reservation system has been adopted by us as a part of our national policy to prevent the extinction of the 250,000 Indians. How much more should this principle be applied, when the patrimony is endangered of sixty millions of our population, who are in the best sense wards of the nation, because they are unable to find capital for establishing their rights and claiming their inheritance.

The sight of hundreds of thousands of families marched in armies, like Israel of old, from the Egypt of poverty to the Canaan of prosperity, is surely one which is calculated to send a thrill of joyful hope through the hearts of the working classes of the world, while it is a practical philanthropy which may well engage the attention of our wisest statesmen, and secure the united and whole-hearted co-operation of every patriot and Christian.

A LAPLANDER

A ROYAL MISSION WORKER

Prince Oscar Bernadotte, of Sweden, an Earnest Preacher

ONE of the most interesting and romantic figures in the gallery of European royalties, is that of Prince Bernadotte, the second son of the wise and learned King of Sweden. Two traits of character combine to render him unique among princes. One is that he is an earnest and devoted Christian, ready at all times to testify for Christ in the palaces of nobles, or to give a Gospel address in a mission hall or a barn. ...he other trait, which the citizens of a republic, and ...pecially women, will appreciate, is his heroic love ...r his wife. So ardent was his affection for her that ...hen he learned that, in order to marry her, he must ...crifice his rank and his right of succession to the ...rone, he cheerfully made the sacrifice, renouncing the ...les and station so dear to the European heart, for ...r sake. A more fascinating personality than a prince ...pable of such conduct it would be difficult to find. ...r. Klopsch had the pleasure of a long interview with ...m when, during his tour of famine relief in Finland, ...is year, he stayed at the Swedish capital. He found ...e Prince exceedingly intelligent, and ...rmly sympathetic with the relief work ...hich had taken him to Europe. He ...as unstinted in his expressions of grati...de to the Christian people of America ...r their benevolence to his father's ...flicted subjects. He made many in...iries about Christian work in America ...d was especially interested in the cir...lation of the Scriptures in this country. ...he plan of the Red Letter Bible he ...artily commended, and expressed a ...ish to possess a copy for use in his ...ork. His wish was complied with, to ...s evident gratification.

Prince Bernadotte is in his forty-fourth ...ear. By his own desire, and with the cor...al approval of the King, his father, he ...ecame a sailor in early life, and for many ...ears was seldom seen at court. The ...ing gave strict injunctions that on ship...oard he should be treated exactly as ...e other officers, and accordingly the ...oung man was inured to hardship and ...ompelled to study strenuously. He ...assed his examinations with honor, and ...on his way to a command in the Swed...h navy by sheer merit. In 1887, he was ...t Stockholm on a furlough, after a two ...ears' voyage around the world. Among ...e ladies in attendance at court, he ...ade the acquaintance of Miss Ebba ...unck, the daughter of a distinguished ...fficer. She was attached to the house...old of the wife of his elder brother, ...id was a general favorite with the royal ...mily. The young sailor prince was won by her modest ...race, her beauty, and her charms of character, and he ...ucceeded in gaining her affection. When she learned, ...owever, that a marriage with him would involve him in the loss of a royal rank and forever bar him from the possibility of succession to the throne, she refused to permit him to make the sacrifice.

In order to escape his pleading and to prove to him that she was resolute in her determination, Miss Munck quitted the Court and disappeared from the circle of aristocratic resorts. The Prince, however, showed manly persistence. He sought her everywhere, and at last found her in a nurse's uniform doing duty in a hospital. He renewed his suit, but with no better success. The only concession he could obtain was the promise that she would accept him if he had the cordial approval of his parents to the union. The Queen, his mother, already knew Miss Munck and loved her, and it was by her pleading that King Oscar's consent was finally won. Under the Swedish constitution the Prince was required to renounce his right of succession to the throne, he was no longer to be addressed as a Royal Highness, and had to leave the splendid mansion he occupied as a prince of the blood. He was allowed to retain his naval rank, which he had honestly won, and with a small private fortune he began his married life. In order to avoid difficulties of Court etiquette, the marriage was solemnized in England, and it has proved an exceedingly happy one.

One common interest drew the young couple into closer union. Miss Munck was an earnest Christian, and she found that her sailor prince had also given his heart to Christ. He told her how, during a tour in Palestine, he had meditated deeply on our Lord's life and teaching: and amid the scenes hallowed by his footsteps during his earthly life, he had consecrated his life to Christ's service. Miss Munck loved him all the more for this resolve, and has loyally and earnestly served with him in every good work. The young couple gave themselves heartily to the cause, and scarcely a week passed without the princess being heard in some mission, or in some social gathering, pleading with sinners to seek Christ. Later, in deference to his father's wish, these public addresses were discontinued, but the royal preacher devoted himself all the more earnestly to the work of the Y. M. C. A. and to other services that the King did not oppose.

A SWEDISH MAID

One sphere of labor to which Prince Bernadotte has taken a deep and active interest is missionary effort among the inhabitants of Lapland. These Lapps differ in race from the Swedes as much as our Indians differ from us and are very much in the same relation. It is believed that they are of Mongolian stock, and they are wedded to a nomadic life. Even in winter, with the thermometer forty degrees below zero, they live and sleep in tents, which, often being made of nothing better than old sacks, are a poor protection from the intense cold. They dress in reindeer skin, and have the roughest manners. The kind of life they led precluded all knowledge of civilization, and in all religious matters they were ignorant and indifferent. But in 1894 one Lapp woman was led to Christ, and she gave so shocking a description of the mental and moral condition of her people that the Woman's Missionary Society sent a missionary to them.

The effort to evangelize the Lapps was laughed to scorn by people familiar with their condition. More than one intimated that a mission to dogs or cattle would not be more futile. For two years there was no result at all, but in 1897 a beginning of the harvest appeared. A young man named Lars Pulsson was converted, and he immediately took active part in spreading the Gospel among his people. He had a singularly beautiful voice, and his singing of Gospel hymns had a thrilling effect in the services. All this time Prince Bernadotte had been directing and encouraging the workers, and now he and the princess traveled northwards, and in spite of the hardships and repulsive conditions, spent some months in active missionary work. His high position, his evident sincerity, and his warm sympathies displayed in the people won their hearts, and the cause of Christ made marked progress. The prince and princess penetrated far into the winter, distributing Christian literature, visiting the people in their tents, and speaking at meetings wherever the people could be collected together.

PRINCE OSCAR BERNADOTTE AND HIS LAPP HELPERS STUDYING THE MAP

A USEFUL LIFE CLOSED

Mrs. Spurgeon, the Widow of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, Passes Away

THE LATE MRS. C. H. SPURGEON

AFTER more than eleven years of widowhood, the beloved wife of the eminent Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and the mother of the present pastor, has been called to her reward. To one who loved so intensely as she did, and who was beloved by her devoted husband so tenderly, his death must have been a crushing blow. Thirty seven ...ears she had been his companion, sharing his most intimate ...houghts, counselling him, cheering him and helping him; ...hile all the time an invalid, herself suffering severely and ...nable to leave her home. His occasional references to her ...n his sermons and speeches, showed how close was the tie ...etween them. Yet, after his death, she wasted no time in unavailing sorrow, but sought more extended usefulness. She made plans for enriching the libraries of poor ministers, and in other ways continuing the charitable work in which he had been so active. Her life was busier than before, and one hopes that in her work she found consolation in her sad bereavement. An intimation is given in the brief cable message announcing her death, that it was in part precipitated, if not directly caused, by exposure in an effort to promote one of the Tabernacle undertakings, in which she took a deep interest. It is very probable, for she was a most unselfish woman. Her late husband said that it was at her suggestion, that the $20,000 which his church gave the couple on their silver wedding celebration was not kept for themselves, but divided between the Pastor's College, the Orphanages, and other institutions that Mr. Spurgeon had organized. She will be sorely missed by thousands of people whose wants she had supplied, but as it was with the Apostle, for herself "it is far better."

The Home of William Penn

ONE of the pleasing reminiscences of a tour through England, is a day spent at Jordan's, the burial place of William Penn, Founder of Pennsylvania. A drive in a coach and four-in-hand, through the most charming woodland lanes in the outskirts of London, brings us to this historic spot. Many Americans make this detour, by way of Chalfont Avon at last reach what looks like an ordinary red brick cottage, but on closer inspection it proves to be an old Quaker meeting-house, very much restored on the exterior. The gallery inside was so constructed, that by pushing forward a certain portion of the woodwork, it was made part of the private house, and looked like an ordinary room. Tradition states that in times of persecution the Quaker women assembled in this gallery, and when the place was visited by soldiers the woodwork was closed up, and only the most ordinary worshiping below were subject to arrest. The Quakers had no two galleries, or two meetings, as Sunday. Suffering this old meeting house, is the quaint little place of the Penn family. There are a number of old monuments of course alike. The one to Wm. Penn states that he died ... decease, 1718. His wife, Hannah Penn, died ... M.D.

Defective Preaching

SOME of the daily newspapers are discussing, with the aid of letters from their readers, the cause of the prevalent agnosticism and scepticism. The opinion of the majority, both of the correspondents and the editors, appears to be that the chief cause is the absence of religious teaching in our public schools. If the question under discussion had been one of morality, this opinion would have been more relevant than it is; but we doubt if any kind of teaching in the public schools would avail to check scepticism. The utmost that could be expected of the teachers, in view of the fact that Jews, as well as all denominations of Christians, are represented among the pupils, is the law of God as the basis of a moral life. All doctrine, and all theology are necessarily excluded because of the attitude of the parents, who would resent their child being taught doctrines which they regard as erroneous.

The real reason for the agnosticism and scepticism, which, by the way, are not so prevalent as some of the writers believe, is much more likely to be the one to which Dr. Patton recently called attention in his inaugural as President of Princeton Theological Seminary. It is the absence from the preaching most popular in our day, of emphasis on the doctrine of the Incarnation. Without directly denying the divinity of Jesus, there is a tendency in the pulpit to dwell chiefly on the human side of his nature, and to hold him up as a philosopher, or a great teacher, rather than as Deity incarnate, as One who had a right to speak with authority. This is doubtless a rebound from the teaching of the eighteenth and early part of the nineteenth centuries, which, to some extent, ignored the human aspect and kept the Divine prominent. The wide popularity of Prof. Seeley's Ecce Homo started the movement, the effect of which is still felt, and which has been accelerated by the Higher Criticism. The result, as President Patton observes, is to eliminate the very essence of Christianity, and to transform it from a religion to a philosophy. The Incarnation is the basis for the doctrine of the Atonement, and preachers are incurring a grave responsibility if they fail to make that fact clear. When a man ceases to regard Christ's suffering as vicarious; when he no longer thinks of him as "God manifest in the flesh," he has lost the power which radiates from the Cross, and is liable to drift into scepticism and agnosticism. If ministers are responsible for many of their hearers traveling that arid road, the sooner they change their course the better for the church.

Euthanasia

MISSIONARIES and other writers, who have traveled much and have come into contact with strange peoples and customs, tell us that in some of the islands of the South Pacific, before the natives became Christianized, it was customary to put aged men and women to death, when they had become a burden to their relatives. In one island, a certain cliff had become famous as the place from which a large number of those aged incapables had been flung headlong to their death on the rocks below. Among the lowest types of savages in Africa, it is asserted, members of a tribe who had reached an age when bodily infirmities prevented them from fighting or hunting, met a somewhat similar fate. But even among savages, this frightful and unnatural crime seems to have been rare. Ties of blood and natural affection are so strong, even among the lowest races, that the suggestion of the murder of helpless kindred is viewed with inconceivable horror and aversion.

If the civilized and Christianized Maori shudders with shame and sorrow at the recollection of those days when his savage progenitors slew their old men and women, what would he think, were he told that the proposition to put to death the helpless aged and the incurably sick had been made by a Christian minister, before an enlightened assemblage, in a land which boasts of its civilization and its humanity? How would the converted heathen in Africa, India, Arabia, or among our own red men, regard it? Yet it was only the other day that a clergyman of the Unitarian church in New York, appeared before the State Medical Association and, in all seriousness, advocated "euthanasia"—an easy means of putting incurables to death—as a merciful and "scientific" method of disposing of the helpless and the hopelessly invalid. He would have the consent of the relatives, of course, he explained, and of the patient as well; and eminent physicians and clergymen should superintend the act. Such a course, he urged, "would be a step forward in civilization."

It would be charitable to conclude that a suggestion at once so un-Christian, so diabolic and so barbarous, emanated from a disordered brain. Such seems to have been the impression of the auditors present at the meeting, for the gospel of scientific murder met with instant rebuke, as might have been expected. It is the glory of the medical fraternity to-day, that its skill has been widely blessed as a means of alleviating pain, curing disease and prolonging life. In ancient times, certain of the heathen cities provided facilities where persons who had made failure of life and were resolved to die, could resort to euthanasia—the painless death—avoiding all publicity. Those were the days of spiritual darkness and of a rude, Christless, inhuman civilization. Let us thank God that we are living in better and kindlier times.

It is written, "Thou shalt not kill," and "All that a man hath will he give for his life." "All the days of my appointed time," said Job, when he was urged to do self-murder, "will I wait, until my change come." Only the fool rushes rashly into the presence of his Maker, and only a madman could have advocated euthanasia, voluntary or involuntary, in a Twentieth Century assembly, and in the name of science. Old or young, sick or well, it is ours to await the Divine pleasure as to the moment when our spirit shall quit its mortal tenement forever.

The Unpopular Neighbor

THERE are few villages or towns which have not somebody within their circuit who is unpopular. The man pays his rent or his taxes, and goes regularly to business. So far as can be discovered, he is a good husband and a kind father, and as a citizen he is irreproachable. Yet, poor fellow, he is a sort of social misfit. On the train he stays by himself. At the station he is on the edge, not in the middle, of the pleasant drifting, neighborly talk, that is so genial and spontaneous. Looking at him, with his gloomy, reticent face, his cynical manner, you feel sure that he keeps a cross dog chained in his back yard, and you think the dog may be allowed freedom to prowl about the moment dusk gathers over the streets, so that you prefer to go round the block rather than to pass the man's guarded door.

Unpopularity is often caused by the reserve, or the moodiness, or the discouragement of a man or woman who fails to get in touch with the world. The ability to keep step is wanting. On the march, the comrades easily hold the pace; but the odd and alien nature, which does not comprehend comradeship, is on the outside, lags behind, is apt to misunderstand others and to be misunderstood. Pathetically forlorn is the situation when a man yearns for sympathy, when a woman envies those who receive and give it, and yet lacks the secret that wins and retains humanity's liking.

Were one, aware of unpopularity, honestly to seek an improvement and a mitigation of its hampering circumstances, the first essential would be self-forgetfulness. To put self wholly into the background and keep it there, would be most helpful toward the end desired. Next, the obvious course would be to become deeply interested in others, so deeply that their comfort and well-being would be an object of very earnest solicitude. Finally, a measure of common sense would indicate the propriety of ignoring manifest unpopularity and behaving as if one were the reverse, were desired, and appreciated and beloved. People take us largely at our own valuation. More ground is lost by drawing into one's shell and brooding over one's deficiencies, than can be made up in the brief span of earthly life. As a rule, we should "look forward and not back, look up and not down, look out and not in, and lend a hand." Following these aphorisms of wisdom, and making them the chart of our progress, we shall need no danger signals against the reefs of unpopularity.

THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER

Tombs of Ancient Kings

IN a European journal, the announcement is made of the discovery of two important tombs in Persia. One of these is the tomb of Cyrus, who gave the Hebrews permission, after the seventy years captivity, to return and rebuild Jerusalem. The tomb was known in Persia as that of the mother of Solomon. Inscriptions, however, discovered by two travelers, prove it to have been the veritable tomb of Cyrus. It stands on seven courses of white limestone, composed of enormous blocks. The walls and ceiling consist of similar blocks, beautifully fitted together. It was originally surrounded by a colonnade, the bases of the columns of which, are still visible. The second discovery was made near Puzeh, where four tombs were found. One of them is undoubtedly that of Darius, the patron of Daniel. Its date is said to be about 485 B.C. An inscription in three languages was found, which clearly identifies the tomb as that of the king who was outwitted by the princes, and induced to sign the decree which sent Daniel to the den of lions, where he was miraculously preserved. All four tombs are cut out of the solid rock; the others are believed to be those of Xerxes, Artaxerxes and Darius II. They are not so elaborate as the tomb of Darius, and there are no inscriptions to indicate for whom they were constructed, but there is a strong presumption that they were for the above mentioned potentates. All the tombs, including that of Cyrus, have been broken open, and their contents carried away. It is, however, something to have seen the stone receptacles of the bodies of kings so celebrated in secular as well as in Biblical history. It is now twenty-three centuries since the latest of those kings was laid in the sepulchre now identified; but though empires have risen and fallen, and powerful dynasties have passed away since then, the words he uttered in solemn proclamation to his people still remain the watchword of history, true in all past time, and true through all eternity.

He is the living God, steadfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end (Daniel 6: 26).

A Crew Saved

The steamer Verona, which has arrived at New York from Japan, brought in a picturesque group of men who had been taken off a sinking vessel in mid ocean. They belonged to the bark Talavera, which sailed from Uruguay for Spain with a cargo of lumber. There were fifteen of them in all, including the captain of the bark. They say that they had been several days out and were making a prosperous voyage, when suddenly they ran into a hurricane, which broke the masts short at the deck. The vessel was so strained by the shock and the bombardment of the high seas, that she sprang a leak and began to settle. They tried to stop the leak, but in the storm nothing could be done. They were all busy baling day and night to keep afloat, until they were completely worn out. Their boats were carried away by the waves, and even had they remained they could not have lived in the storm. The forward part of the vessel was under water and the crew huddled aft, exhausted by labor and exposure, waiting for the death that seemed inevitable. Two days and nights of suspense thus passed, and on the morning of the third day the Verona hove in sight. She lowered two boats, which were manned by volunteers, and took all the crew off safely and brought them to New York. The poor men on the sinking bark needed no persuasion to induce them to quit the wretched hulk, in which all they had was contained. They gladly left it when safety was offered them. If men to whom the offer of the Gospel is made, only knew how similar to theirs is their own condition, they, too, would lose no time, and need no pulpit appeals, before they sought safety in Christ:

Let us therefore fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it (Heb. 4: 1).

Lost Hidden Wealth

An aged man sits moaning and shedding tears in the house of his son in New York, over the loss of his savings. He was in business for more than fifty years, in a house which was recently condemned, and is now being pulled down. Early in his business career he deposited his savings in a bank. The bank failed, and nearly all his deposit was lost. He declared that he would never trust another bank. He then hid his money in hiding-places he made in the walls and under the flooring of the rooms. Being of an extremely secretive disposition, he would never tell even his own sons the location of these hiding-places. They did not worry over it, as their father had an excellent memory, and, when he needed money in business, always produced it without any difficulty. As he grew older, however, his memory failed him, and sometimes there was a time of searching before he could find his hoard. The difficulty increased during the past year or two. Finally, when the house was condemned and he received notice to vacate, he became anxious. He collected the hoards from every hiding-place he could remember, but suspected that there must be some he had forgotten. He had to leave, at last, and he has plenty of money to live upon, and besides, his son is able and willing to care for him, but that does not console him for his loss, which he estimates at $3,000. So far, the contractor declares that no money has been found; but the old man insists that he is being robbed, and seems likely to worry himself into his grave. Happily, there is no fear of his loss causing him to want the necessaries of life in his old age. His distress is due to the very precautions he took to avoid it. Long ago the Preacher witnessed such cases, and uttered the warning which men still refuse to heed.

There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun, namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt (Eccles. 5: 13).

Preventing Consumption

The Medical Congress at Cassel, Germany, listened recently with intense interest to a paper by Prof. Von Behring, on the prevention of consumption. The eminence of the Professor, his known conservatism, and the success he has had in the treatment of diphtheria, combined to impress his audience with the possibility of his having discovered a cure for the dread scourge of consumption. The Professor said that his experiments were not yet sufficiently complete to warrant his announcing success, but that he had the highest hopes. His theory is that the seeds of tuberculosis are received in infancy, and that while in many instances they do not take effect, owing to the vigor of the child's constitution, in others, owing to weakness, over-exertion, improper or inadequate food they develop after several years and do their fatal work. He believes that an antidote to the germs exists in the milk of animals which have been rendered immune by the administration of tuberculous virus. He would employ the active principle of the virus, together with the antidote, and thus, as in small-pox and other diseases render the patient practically immune, if the treatment if applied before the development of the germs. Whether the professor's theory is right, time alone can show. We know that to be spiritual world the principle could not be successfully applied. The only cure for the dread scourge of sin, which is more to be dreaded than consumption, can come alone from Him who knew no sin.

He hath made him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him (II Cor. 5: 21).

A Novel Cargo Steamer

An enormous vessel has just been added to the Dutch mercantile fleet, which is said to surpass in carrying capacity the largest vessels afloat. Its name is the Conveyor, which has been given it because of its identification with the Conveyor district of that name in Sweden. It is capable of carrying a cargo of 14,500 tons. It is 450 feet long, and 58 feet in beam, and has a draught of 25 feet. Its novel feature is in its having no cargo masts, in each of which two derricks are attached, with steam winches. The engineers say that these new appliances will insure the whole cargo of the enormous vessel being discharged in thirty-five hours. It was built at Sunderland, England, for its present owners, Messrs. William Muller & Co., for the transport of iron ore from Oxelosund, Sweden, to Rotterdam. It is only another illustration of the characteristics of our times, which is seen in the adaptation of means to ends regardless of grace or beauty of form. One could wish that some of our preachers, who are more careful about their style and eloquence than about the effect of their sermons in the salvation of souls, would adopt this principle. The rule adopted by the Apostle which was effectual in his day, would have that result now.

We ought never to think more highly of ourselves than we ought to think; but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith (Rom. 12: 3).

THE RECENTLY DISCOVERED TOMB OF CYRUS

TOMBS OF DARIUS AND HIS ROYAL SUCCESSORS

BRIEF NOTES

The Christian Missionary Society of the Church of the Disciples has appointed Charles G. Hill, M.A., of Ireland, into the field now in charge of Prof. Thos. Van Ess, A.M., D.D. and Dr. S. C. Kennedy, of Canada.

Dr. George E. Dawson has just returned from the Philippines after a visit of six months to the missionary fields in those islands. Last Sunday he spoke at the Second Presbyterian church, Brooklyn.

A report of the past season in South Russia, the country that during the summer has been overrun by a terrible famine, says that the harvest is the worst in the history of the country. A large number of cattle have died, and the people are in a deplorable condition.

Dr. Lorimer Fison, the missionary pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of New York, has completed his studies for the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He has been pastor of the church for three years, and has also been pastor of the Asbury church, Brooklyn.

A witness in a recent trial held in connection with the Rev. Thomas Dixon's sermon in the Grand Opera House, New York, against the theatre, testified that Edward Rice, the actor, had been a total abstainer for a long time, owing to the influence of Dr. Dixon.

WHY PASTOR SPURGEON NEVER VISITED AMERICA

He Dreaded the Feting and Feasting Ordeal

BY THE
REV. THOMAS SPURGEON

He was Afraid of Being "Killed with Kindness"

WHY did not C. H. Spurgeon visit America? Echo answers, "Why?" Nobody seems to know for certain. The question is propounded to me almost every Sunday during the summer months in my vestry at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and, although I think I know something of the matter, I have not found it easy to answer in a word or two. So I have been thinking upon and searching into the subject, and here are some of my musings and findings.

C. H. SPURGEON

It is not to be wondered at that there are people in both the Old World and the New who marvel that the great preacher never crossed the Atlantic. Most of the famous men of the United States have visited Britain, and not a few of England's leading teachers have journeyed to America and through the States. Moreover, such a welcome has been accorded to them that others might well have been tempted to do likewise.

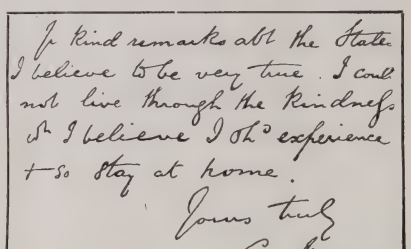
C. H. Spurgeon was popular in America almost from the first. Dr. Armitage said of him, "He carries the least amount of religion possible in the whites of his eyes, but a living well of it in the depth of his soul." The circulation of his sermons in the States was enormous as soon as they began to be published, and although it received a decided check at a certain stage, it soon recovered and continued very large. The prejudices which beset the young Nonconformist preacher in his own land could not exist in the freer atmosphere where Church and State were not joined together in unholy alliance, and where freedom to worship God according to the dictates of conscience was the happy heritage of all the people.

Of course, those who read his sermons with delight longed to hear his voice, the more so when they learned something of what a bell-like voice it was. So it came to pass that the hope was early cherished that his readers might become his hearers; that those who profited by the printed page might see him face to face. When an American journal said, "Mr. Spurgeon is as much an object of interest in the United States as in his native land, and there is an intense desire to see him," it voiced the general feeling of the country. That Americans were interested in his ministry was plainly proved by the crowds that flocked to hear him.

There was a sort of American quarter in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, on the extreme left of the rostrum, in the lower gallery, with sprightly little Miss Bonser as attendant—the only feminine seat-steward that the Tabernacle has ever boasted. How alert and nimble she was! She was delighted with these visitors from afar, and, if I mistake not, they were pleased with her courtesy and attention. They would appreciate, too, the special and appropriate prayer of the pastor, Sunday by Sunday, for "our kin across the sea." Most felicitously, yet with manifest earnestness, he poured out his soul in supplication for our sister nation. Let me quote a specimen or two which have been preserved. "Remember in great mercy our beloved brethren from the United States, and let their churches prosper, and the kingdom of Christ come among them." "Lord bless our sister countries, where Christ is preached as here—preached in our own dear mother tongue. God bless them!"

The references as a rule were brief, but there was no mistaking the cordial feeling which prompted them. Strangers felt at home at once in a place where their own home was named in fervent prayer, and their hearts warmed towards the preacher who, in the multitude of his thoughts within him, could find space for a definite petition for those who came from a far country.

It has been thought by others that Mr. Spurgeon so dreaded the voyage that that in itself sufficed to keep him in Europe. True, he did not delight in voyaging, but I think it was rather in view of the confinement involved than because of fear of either danger or sickness. He crossed our choppy channel twice yearly, without hesitation, and when he has been yachting on the east coast of Scotland, he has not proved himself to be "a bad sailor." He used, I must confess, to quote to me, when I was setting sail for Australia, Dr. Johnson's famous saying, to the effect that making a voyage was like going to prison with a chance of being drowned; but I do not believe that either the prison or the peril, or both combined, would have prevented him, had he distinctly heard the call of God.



Facsimile reproduction from Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's letter giving his reasons for not visiting America

But was he ever invited? Indeed he was. Lecture agents did their very best to secure him. The redoubtable Major Pond was most anxious to add him to his long and noteworthy list, but could not obtain so much as an interview. To all suggestions of the sort, accompanied by amazingly generous terms though they were, he turned an absolutely deaf ear. Moreover, it was abundantly evident that he said "Nay" to these proposals without the shadow of a regret. He would, I verily believe, have preferred not to be approached with such requests; and I am by no means sure but that, if there ever was any thought with him of visiting the States, it was quenched rather than kindled by these splendid offers.

They, perhaps, are nearer the mark who have concluded that he felt unable to leave his varied work. "I am chained to the oar," he himself often said to those who besought him to come their way. He might well say that. His college, his orphanage, his colportage association claimed constant attention. His own church numbered five thousand members, and the care of a multitude of other churches rested upon him. His sermons (carefully revised by himself), were issued weekly by week, and his magazine, The Sword and the Trowel, of which he was by no means the nominal editor, appeared every month. His literary work occupied all his leisure (?) time. At Mentone, whither he resorted every year, he continued to be in touch with his work. Further afield he would have been ill at ease about it. Personally, I believe that the real secret lay just here. He was wedded to his work and loved it too well to leave it. Allied to this devotion to the multifarious works, most of which he had called into being, was a decided shrinking, especially in later years, from the excitement consequent on the assembling together of very great crowds. Moreover, the very idea of "starring" was utterly abhorrent to him, and he objected to being lionized as much as Dr. Judson, "The Apostle of Burmah," did, of whom it is recorded that, during a visit to America, he disappointed certain of his audiences by not sufficiently emphasizing his adventures and achievements, and who confessed that the greatest favor he could ask of his Christian friends would be to permit him to return as soon as possible to his home on the banks of the Salwen. Feting and feasting were not at all to C. H. Spurgeon's mind, and interviewing he could not tolerate. Had he ventured on a tour, he would have felt obliged to accept invitations and to attend receptions, even though they were proving disasteful to his heart and injurious to his health, for he would have wished to avoid appearing discourteous to any, at all costs. He therefore deemed it wiser to refrain from visiting that country, which of all lands would certainly have given him the warmest possible welcome. So sure was he of the extreme interest and unbounded kindness of the Americans, that this very assurance helped to decide him not to run the risk of overtaxing his strength, and of possibly having to disappoint an expectant people after all. He declined many urgent requests to journey to Australia, where his reception would have been not less hearty than it would have proved in the United States, on similar grounds. Concerning that country, I remember that one of his admirers assured him that if he would but come to Melbourne the very kangaroos would come hopping into town from "the mallee scrub" up-country to hear him preach. And yet he kept away!

That he himself took the view of the matter which I have emphasized is pretty plainly proved by a characteristic word of his own which forms the postscript of a private letter to a correspondent who had evidently broached the subject. The letter itself is on quite another theme. I give the laconic sentence as it stands in the letter, after the well known signature. It constitutes at once a tribute to the American people, and the great preacher's own answer to the question, "Why did not C. H. Spurgeon visit America?"

AID FOR THE MACEDONIANS

Miss Ellen Stone, the Famous Missionary, Appeals in their Behalf

IF ever there was an illustration of returning good for evil, and thus heaping "coals of fire" upon the heads of those who have done wrong, it is to be found in the letter from Miss Ellen M. Stone, the famous missionary, which we print below. The story of Miss Stone's abduction by Macedonian brigands, some two years ago, her imprisonment in the mountains, with Mme. Tsilka as her companion in suffering, and her final release, after a heavy ransom had been exacted by her abductors, is still fresh in the minds of our readers. Since then, the terrible outbreak of war in Macedonia has decimated the population of Monastir vilayet, where Miss Stone was made prisoner, and the district where she suffered so much is now a scene of bloodshed and incendiarism. Thousands of the people are homeless and starving. Putting aside all resentment, and without even referring to her own perilous experience, Miss Stone appeals to the sympathy of the American people in behalf of the Macedonians, who are now fighting for freedom from Turkish rule. Here is her letter:

"9 CRESCENT AVENUE,
"CHELSEA, MASS., October 20, 1903.

"To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

"It gives me pleasure to forward to you the enclosed appeal, from the Bulgarian Evangelical Society. The names signed are all names of well-known pastors and business men of standing in the churches and communities where they reside.

"God grant that this appeal on behalf of the Christians who have so long suffered under their Moslem rulers, and whose situation is now indescribably terrible, may reach hearts tender to pity them, and resolute to intercede for them with an insistence which takes no denials.

"Very truly yours, ELLEN M. STONE."

The appeal enclosed in Miss Stone's letter recites the condition of affairs in Macedonia, and says:

The present assassination of thousands of Christians, and the destruction of hundreds of villages with their Christian church buildings, is a triumph of Mohammedan fanaticism over the Christianity and Christian civilization of the twentieth century. Shall our Christian faith be trodden under foot by Mohammedanism? Will God's people all over the Christian world remain silent and irresponsive to the bitter cries of the dying ones in Macedonia?

Dearly beloved in Christ, through the native Bulgarian Evangelical Society, which for twenty-eight years has been a power for good among the European provinces of Turkey, the Protestant churches in Bulgaria, together with their auxilliaries—the Sunday Schools, the Christian Endeavor Societies, and other Christian organizations, pray you most earnestly to raise your united voices, and ask your Governments to take such timely measures, with the Christian states of Europe, as shall put a stop to the horrible atrocities and the rapid extermination of the Christian population in Macedonia.

The signers are J. J. Sefchanoff, president of the Bulgarian Evangelical Society and pastor of the Protestant Church, Philippopolis, Bulgaria; A. S. Tsanoff, vice-president, and editor of the paper Zornitsa; Vulko J. Shopoff, general manager of the Society; M. N. Popoff, treasurer of the Society, and pastor of the Protestant Church, Sophia; Dimiter N. Furnajieff, secretary, and pastor of the Protestant Community in Kustendil, and J. M. Tsakoff, pastor of the Protestant Church in Haskovo.

Contributions in aid of the refugees, sent to this journal, will be forwarded to Dr. J. F. Clarke, the well-known American missionary in Samokov, Bulgaria. Dr. Clarke's portrait appears on this page.

"The White Door"

Miss Harriet Irwin, Head Worker of "The White Door," the Gospel Settlement at No. 211 Clinton street, New York, writes in acknowledgment of the contributions received in aid of the work. She adds:

"We have an attendance of 848 a week, from the children of three years in the kindergarten, up through kitchen garden, sewing, basketry classes and art, city history, parliamentary law, Happy Hour Clubs, of girls and boys and young women, to grandmothers of sixty and seventy in the Mothers' Club, and we need equipment. Such happy classes and clubs! If you could see where your generous gifts have been placed, I am quite sure you would be satisfied."

Drawing-Room Talks

Character Building in Children

CURRENT events are not in themselves of as much importance as what we get out of them. In our daily papers, the current is swift and the events are not always pleasing; but what they mean is of the utmost importance to us.

I was at the ocean during the recent stormy weather, and through it all was learning very important lessons. I noticed my hostess took comfort, all through the hours of the fierce gale in the fact that the house was well built. To be sure, the shutters were blown off and the windows broken; but even when the house shook a little, she said, "I am sure of the good foundation of this house." It stood the storm. It was well built, with no gingerbread adorning.

I do not know what storms and hurricanes are for but to make somebody stronger, and to my mind the one thing that needs to be strengthened is God-like character—a character that will stand the strain that life puts upon it. Our house of character must be well built. The foundation must be sure. There is no question about the storms that are ahead—storms of temptation, that will try character to the utmost.

In the storm I have mentioned, I thought of one cottage after another that I felt very doubtful about. I had sat on the porch of a house only a few hours before, and had said, "How this house has been neglected! It looks as if it has not had a fresh coat of paint in years." The woodwork looked rotten, and I said, "How can it stand a hurricane?" I afterward saw the woodwork lifted and strewn into slivers on the lawn.

But all such damage is very small; carpenters and painters will soon remedy it. But how about the devastation after a gale of passion? I see boys and girls who are not taken care of by fathers and mothers, and who receive no lessons of self-denial and no laying of foundation-stones. Never shall I forget the face of my mother when, looking at me with suffering eyes—for she suffered more than I did—she said I had told an untruth. "Now," she said, "I shall never know after this whether to believe you or not." She made the fact awful by her sadness. I said: "Oh, mother, do not say that! I will not do it again." But she did not smile. She looked at me, and I remembered what she had said. "I shall not know when to believe you." She laid a foundation-stone then. The memory of her and her words I have never forgotten.

Look out mothers—all the clubs, even mothers' clubs. All you hear or say is not to be compared in importance with the care of the moral character of your children. I have known of temperance women, so-called (who were not temperate), who made their boys hate the word "temperance," because it was associated with the absence of home comforts and the only nights without a mother's company. If others have a right to speak to mothers, I feel that I have such a right even more. I have lived a long life, have experienced much, and observed much, and have a right to speak a word of warning to the mothers of this generation. If you forget everything in the Bible, don't forget this: "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." If you sow neglect, you will reap neglect. If you sow to the spirit, you will reap spirit. If you have such a weak love (that is not worthy of the name of love), that it makes you feel you cannot deny your child anything—cannot teach it that self-denial is one of the most valuable in the school of life—do not be surprised in after days if it will not deny itself what it wants, even though it should belong to another. It has been used to have everything it wanted. Can you be surprised that the seed you sowed has brought forth fruit?

I am not pleading for unloving severity, but for loving severity. I once saw a child of only a few summers disciplined by a mother whom the child adored. He did something she told him not to do. It was not much, but he was disobedient: and when he came bounding in, hungry for his supper, and the delicious odor of the food made the child dance for joy, the mother met him in the hall and calmly said, "Go to your room. You know you ought not to do so and so, and yet you disobeyed me. I will send you up bread and water for your supper." The cry of that child I shall never forget. I did not feel that I could go in to supper. I looked at the mother when she did not see that I was studying her, and I saw how it had cost her to do her duty. The child was the very apple of her eye. He did not touch the supper. Never since I forget the look of that child when I went in to kiss him good night. The storm was over. He was eating his bread and water, and with such a hearty voice he said, "Oh, this is so good! I never tasted anything so good." I learned afterwards that when that mother punished both her children for quarreling, they climbed into her lap and kissed the tears from her face and asked for forgiveness for grieving her so. That woman may live to see them grow up, and she may not, but she is making their characters for time and eternity. She denied herself in denying them.

Some one has asked me, this week, to give my voice against this marrying for money or title. Ah, the flower is only the fruit of the tree! It is the real truth—"Whatsoever a man (or woman) soweth they shall reap." If the daughter has had it instilled in her that money or title is the one thing needful, how can you expect that such a daughter should not follow the teachings she has received?

Sometimes I like to turn Scripture around a little. St. Paul said, in writing to Timothy, "When I call to remembrance the faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and in thy mother Eunice, I am persuaded it is in thee also." You see it was heredity, and to-day it could be said of many: "When I call to remembrance the frivolity that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother and then in thy mother, I am persuaded is in thee also."

Frivolous mothers and frivolous grandmothers have done all the business.

STILL SOUL-WINNING UNDER CANVAS

ALTHOUGH the open-air evangelistic season in the Eastern and Middle States has practically closed, tent work is still going on in several localities. Gospel services are being held with great and deepening interest at Marietta, Pa., conducted by Evangelist Robert E. Johnston, of Chicago. He has an idea that smaller towns, as well as cities, can be reached with an open-air Gospel, and the past summer has been greatly blessed in meetings of earnest spirit. His tent was first pitched at Alvia, Tex., where two hundred and sixty conversions were reported. He uses a large brown khaki drill tent. It seats nine hundred, but has never been large enough. At Mount Joy, hundreds heard the Gospel through the canvas, who could not get inside for the crowd. On the October Communion Sabbath, many converts were taken into the six churches that had united in calling the evangelist. Mother Lehman, aged ninety-nine years, was an interested attendant at the tent meetings. The majority of the converts were men, some of them the leading business men of the town. There was an absence of all claptrap methods, and a fervent spirit pervading all the meetings.

SINGER J. R. HEMMINGER — EVANGELIST ROBERT E. JOHNSTON

A GOSPEL SERVICE AT THE GREAT KHAKI GOSPEL TENT AT MARIETTA, PA.

Mr. Johnston looks for practical results from his meetings. During the Mount Joy meetings, the Milk Dealers' Association advertised they would sell no milk on Sunday, but would deliver sufficient quantities Saturday nights. The butchers followed this example. Then the icemen and the bakers stopped selling and delivering on the Lord's day, and even the barbers fell in with the Sabbath observance idea. Four hundred and fifty persons went over in a body from the Mount Joy meetings to help start the meetings at Marietta, carrying with them the warmth and fervor of the revival that had stirred their own town.

The large tent now used at Marietta measures sixty by ninety feet. For the fall it is fairly warm, but the evangelist is planning for a large movable tabernacle for winter use, which will seat from fifteen hundred to two thousand people. There has become awakening to all the towns where the tent has been erected.

Mr. Johnston was born of Christian parents, at Keyser, W. Va. His mother was a saintly and consistent Christian, and it was the prayer of her life that her son might preach Jesus. He attended meetings held by Evangelist Fite, and later he and his wife were converted, and he began at once to carry God's message to others. He went as a student to Moody's Bible Institute, and traveled with Evangelist Fite as leader of singer. Later he entered upon the practice of work as evangelist. He has labored in many different States. His tent singer is Mr. J. R. Hemminger, formerly teacher and choir-leader in a wealthy Presbyterian Church. Mr. Hemminger has accompanied Mr. Johnston, and has sung the Gospel with blessing where sermons would not be listened to.

Mr. Johnston says his present tent was given to him in answer to prayer, and he believes he will get the larger tabernacle in the same way.

OSCAR, THE RAGGED NEWSBOY

A Homeless Boys' Commonwealth

And How a Little, Wandering, Ragged Lad became its First Duly Elected President

OSCAR, THE COMMONWEALTH PRESIDENT

BELIEVING in the transforming power of love and kindness, a man who signs himself "A Friend of Boys" has personally undertaken the training of a band of homeless, neglected little lads, who might otherwise have drifted into lives of crime and degradation. He is teaching them the duties of citizenship and the dignity of self-help; giving them an opportunity for moral and mental expansion, and instructing them in truthfulness, honesty and cleanliness. Their little creed is "Always Do Right," and, considering the entire lack of training in early life, they are living up to it wonderfully well.

Mr. Hermon L. Swift, of Kalkaska, Mich., the "Friend of the Boys" in question, with only $18 capital, began his rescue work in 1897. Several years ago he founded Beulah Land Academy, at Charlevoix, Mich., acquiring for that purpose several large hotel buildings and 120 acres of land. "During the past year," said Mr. Swift, "we have received one hundred and forty homeless boys from the streets of our large cities, and given them every opportunity of growing into good Christian men. This seemed to me to be the most practical kind of missionary work."

Beulah Land Academy is really a Junior Co-operative Commonwealth, where every boy is a joint owner from the moment he sets foot upon the farm. It is a government of the boys, by the boys and for the boys. They select from their own number a president, a vice-president, a secretary and a treasurer, and every member goes to the Assembly, which makes the laws.

From the state of being an outcast boy of eleven years, whose sole wardrobe was a man's pair of trousers, cut off at the knees, lapped around the body, and held in place by a rope; no shirt; an apology for a coat, and a ragged cap—to that of being President of a Co-operative Commonwealth—may seem a long step, yet it has been taken by Oscar Weber in less than two years. He was unanimously chosen by the "fellow-citizens" of his Republic, as their first President. Another boy citizen, who has the Presidential bee "buzzing in his bonnet," is now running, under what, to a candidate, might be regarded as a serious handicap. He had even less worldly possessions than President Weber. He had no name, other than "Rusty," up to the time he joined the Junior Republic. Since that time he has acquired the name of Frank, by annexation. His chances of seeing his ambitions realized are good.

Even the finances of the little Commonwealth are conducted by the boys; and everything to be built, bought or sold, must be decided by consent of the Assembly. The financial system is decidedly original. A boy who does his very best, receives three credits per hour, in the pay of the Commonwealth. Ten credits make one merit, ten merits one share. On Thanksgiving Day, the stockholders ascertain the gross profits, from which they deduct the total expenses. The net profits are divided among the shareholders. The boy's money is put in bank, to be drawn only for his start in life when he begins to provide for himself, and goes out to become a citizen of our larger Republic.

Each boy is assigned a plot of about two acres, and all plots front on a lake, called by the boys "The Dead Sea," because it has no visible outlet. The owner is entitled to all that can be made by crops, or wood-cutting on his property, and there is a busy time during recreation hours and on Saturdays, when the boys are not tramping the woods with Mr. Swift, studying natural history.

During summer vacation, another source of added income is from weeding beets on the great beet-sugar farms. Mr. Swift took, at one time, as many as 200 boys to one of these great plantations. Each boy was to have from fifteen to twenty dollars, with a new suit of clothes added for good behavior. At the close of the time for which they were engaged, it was evident that another week's work was needed. The small laborers feared they were being imposed upon, and a "strike" was imminent.

Mr. Swift, however, wisely waited until he could engage their attention quietly. He then made an appeal, which was supplemented by a barrel of candy, a barrel of peanuts, a case of lemons and a big supply of fireworks, from the treasury of the sugar company. The day was won, the work completed and the suit of clothes clause duly fulfilled.

This year, for five weeks, the boys camped near the beet farms of the Charlevoix Sugar Company at Kalkaska, Mich., weeding beets, and made between twenty and thirty dollars apiece. Mr. E. W. Coulter, superintendent of agriculture, said: "The Beulah boys an those from other places, under the care of Mr. Hermon L Swift, have done most excellent work in thinning, weec ing and hoeing. It could not have been done better by men.

While each boy's money was put in bank to his credi they were permitted to contribute, as they felt disposed, t the little Cuban War o phans. They gave in al fifty dollars of their pr cious earnings. One litt fellow said to Mr. Swi that it was the first tim in his life he had ever ha a chance to do somethin for some one else and i just "made him feel goo all over."

Mr. Swift himself open ed his home, at Ba Springs, to four little Cu ban War orphans. Thes little lads had a receptio that fairly overwhelme them. Treasures an gifts had been saved fo weeks to shower upo their little Cubans.

Prof. H. E. Bell, super intendent of City School at Bay Springs, writes in high commendation o Mr. Swift's beneficen work in the Beulah Lan Home. He says the hand of the Lord is in this en terprise of rescuing the homeless waifs from lives of destitution and de pravity, and (under God's guidance) training them for lives of usefulness and Christian citizenship.

The Home is unsectarian, and the pastors of the different churches in Boyne City frequently hold services in the chapel. The wife of one of the wealthy and prominent citizens is in charge of the Junior League. The only requirement for admission is that the applicant shall be a homeless boy and in need of a friend. Every boy is welcome at Beulah Home, whatever his record. Mr. Swift says that he wishes that he could have the "very worst boy that exists in the world to-day and try what a few months of life in Beulah Land Commonwealth would do for him." He believes, from the experience of the last two years with his young charges, that the Beulah system would reform even the worst of boys.

The work, by virtue of its goodness, has gained many friends, but new ones are needed. It is not possible for a work of this character to become self-supporting. Any one who is interested in the work, and who communicates with Mr. Swift at Bay Springs, will be supplied with all necessary information.

A GATHERING OF BEULAH BOYS IN THEIR COMMONWEALTH HOME

THE HOMELESS BOYS AT BEULAH AS A BRIGADE OF FIELD AGRICULTURISTS

The Lutheran Church and the India Orphans

BALTIMORE, August 31, 1903.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Foreign Missions, of the Evanglical Lutheran Church, I was directed to officially convey to you its hearty appreciation of your generous support of India Famine Orphans, now in the care of our mission at Guntur, India. In this expression of gratitude, the entire Church heartily unites with the Board. Under separate cover I send you a marked copy of the Biennial Report of the Board, which has just been published. This report was presented to the General Synod. at its recent meeting held in Baltimore, and contains the official action of the Board and the General Synod, on the subject above referred to.

On behalf of the Board,

China Missionaries Grateful

The following voluntary acknowledgment of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S effective relief work in the Kwang-si famine comes from the South China Missionary Conference of the C. and M. A., at Wuchow, and will be read with interest, especially by all those who have aided the relief movement:

"Wuchow, So. China, July 6, 1903.

"LOUIS KLOPSCH, ESQ., Editor THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

"Dear Mr. Klopsch:—The missionaries of the Christian and Missionary Alliance in South China, assembled in Conference at Wuchow, desire to express their deep appreciation of your prompt response to Consul-Gen. McWade's appeal for help on behalf of the Kwang-si famine sufferers.

"Many expressions of gratitude come to us from the lips of those whom, through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S generosity, we have been enabled to relieve. We are sure that this relief work has done much to win for the missionary the confidence and respect of the people, and will afford us opportunities for preaching the Gospel, hitherto unknown.

"You will receive from us a brief account of the famine, which, we trust, will be of interest to yourself and the contributors. In behalf of the Conference,

(Signed) HENRY ZEHR,
BELLA G. FEE, Committee."

People Who Succeed

SUCCESSFUL people must be, in certain aspects of their character, aggressive. The world is full of competitors who risk much to gain its prizes. Those who are contented to sit by the wayside, waiting for a coach to arrive and pick them up, may wait in vain, while the resolute and brave-hearted forge ahead on their own feet. Success is more or less a matter of stern and fearless determination to conquer fate against odds.

It is also a matter of equipment. The person of trained powers in any given field will achieve better results than the one whose skill is small, and whose knowledge is fragmentary. In war times the regulars furnish the better officers, and may be depended upon for seasoned endurance and sturdy opposition, though the volunteers soon catch their spirit and acquire their energy. Discipline is part of the equipment of soldier, athlete, explorer, sailor, diplomat, and business man. Without discipline an army is a mob, and a mob has no permanent success. Mob energy is destructive only. The individual who would succeed in life must have his faculties drilled, so that they serve him like an army, not like a mob.

And success, too, is largely an affair of personality. A winning manner is half the battle in many a man's experience. The man who is modest, confident, conciliatory, and charming, has an immense advantage over his fellow, who is blustering and brusque, or uncertain and vacillating. Granted, a fine equipment, native courage and decision, and an attractive manner, and success is almost assured to the one who is in downright earnest. The dilettante, the woman or the man who does not care, who is willing to drift, reluctant to take the initiative, and imperfectly prepared for the road, will never gain the race, where issues are so positive and odds so tremendous.

Mother and Teacher

"I always invite my children's teachers to dinner two or three times a term," said Mrs. Elwood, as she watched her trio of bright children scampering down the road.

"You do? Why?" Mrs. Redmond was lingering on the doorstep, a plate and a napkin in her hand. These neighbors had a fashion of exchanging delicacies, muffins, puffs, popovers and the like, or dainty moulds of blanc-mange, and lucent tumblers of jelly.

"I have found that the teachers take more interest when they know the homes from which their pupils come, and if I establish friendly relations with them, I can tell them where my children need special help, and guard them from misunderstanding. Little Mabel, who is truth incarnate, was accused of an evasion by the new teacher yesterday, and her feelings were deeply hurt. I would not have had this happen for any money I could have spared, but the trouble was that Miss Owen has been used to untruthful children, and she is young and inexperienced and not acquainted with Mabel. I shall have the teacher here on Saturday, treat her with distinction, and in a tactful way, let her learn my wishes about my little girl."

"Do you find fault with the teacher in the children's presence?"

"Certainly not. That would break down the teacher's authority and impair her influence. I am conscientious in sustaining the teacher, but privately I uphold my children, unless they are in the wrong."

"Well," said Mrs. Redmond, "my children are scrambling along without so much fuss. I have so many things to do that I don't bother about them, beyond seeing that they are washed and dressed, and that they say their prayers night and morning. I can't see where you get time to take notice of every little thing as you do."

"The children's education is the biggest thing I have on hand," said the lady, smiling. "All the rest must wait on that for the next ten years. This is my work, and I have it to do. And I want my children's teachers to have my help in the work they have to do."

"Good-by, dear," said the other mother, hurrying away.

Reading Aloud

To read aloud well is a charming accomplishment. Good reading is, first of all, interpretation. It is the exact conveyance to the mind of the listener of the meaning of the author. Every word should be clearly enunciated, crisp and clean cut as it leaves the reader's lips, but elocution is not needed, nor dramatic pauses and highly-colored effects; they in fact spoil the pleasure of reading for most people.

A wideawake young woman some years ago made a success of reading aloud to parlor audiences, afterward extending her field to halls and churches. She selected stories by popular writers and read them pleasingly without affectation or undue emphasis, studying the art of so managing her voice, that it carried well. She spoke so distinctly that even those who were somewhat deaf found no difficulty in hearing her, and she made a little money for herself in a womanly and refined way of her own choosing.

A young lady, consecrated to the service of her Master, looked about her for opportunities of quietly doing good. She was modest and retiring, and sought unobtrusive ministries. She found some of them in reading to old people whose eyes were dim, and in amusing little children who came to her on Saturday afternoons to hear her story-books that were their delight.

If one would learn to sing, she must pay almost a fortune for her technique, but one who wishes to become a thoroughly fine reader, may do so at the cost of inexpensive lessons; may almost teach herself.

The Children's Grace

Never partake of a meal without rendering thanks for it to God, and let some child in the family ask God's blessing, if the parents do not like to do it themselves. There is special fitness in having the little ones, who are nearest the kingdom of heaven, perform this service.

DUMB FRIENDS

SOME friends who serve and love us,
And at our bidding come,
Are sometimes what we foolishly
Describe as creatures dumb.

THEY speak not with our voices,
Their tongue is not like ours,
But they can love and trust us
And they serve us with their powers.

The Keeping of Accounts

NO thoughtful person can doubt the wisdom of keeping accounts, as well as of preparing them. [illegible] one can afford not to be possessed of [illegible] knowledge as to where the money goes. But to know not only where it goes, but also [illegible] tion of it goes to the various objects of [illegible] we need a special system of accounts. I have devised one so very simple and easy, and yet so satisfactory, that I venture to suggest it to others.

By means of this system I can tell at a glance on any day of the year, just what I have spent since the beginning of the year, on any one of the various kinds of expenditure that may have been required.

Illustration of course is necessary to make this clear, so I will say that taking a rather large blank book I give to several pages the headings, for instance clothing, [illegible] (which doubtless ought to receive a fifth, or more, on [illegible] keeping accounts for a family, one would need pages for food, for fuel, for furniture, etc.

For pages I rule two columns. In the first I put the [illegible] each separate item as the [illegible] the total of pages, thus preserving the additions with every page as I go along, instead of adding a long column at the foot of each page.

Of course this requires [illegible] extra adding and extra writing at the [illegible] which by some may be deemed a disadvantage. But this is slight compared with the satisfaction of knowing all the time just what one has spent and how one stands. I have to my credit at present some eighteen up to the present.

To make my description clearer, I give a specimen or two:

[illegible] PAID FOR FOOD.

July 7...Dr. [illegible] for the week ..... $ 50

July 14...For Fruit, Ice [illegible] ..... 1 [illegible] 25

Aug. ...By Mr. [illegible] ..... 2 [illegible] 50

CLOTHING.

Jan. 1...For CHRISTMAS [illegible] 1 50

Jan. 1...For [illegible] ..... 2 [illegible] 50

Feb. ...For [illegible] ..... 1 [illegible] 25

One can see at a glance what proportion one thing bears to another. The system is a sort of mental aid guide. Whenever one uses it one becomes strongly attached to it and desires to do it, it gives great satisfaction. A. E. H.

Our friend's plan is admirable. We thank her for sending it. Many of our readers would save money if they were to keep accounts of their expenditures. My Lady Our Assistant of LADY HELPFUL HOUSEKEEPING has published a system of household accounts in a very readable small volume, which is as handy pattern as any thing of the kind in existence.

"THE PSALM MEN LOVE"

DAVID'S TRUST IN GOD

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 15
PSALM 23

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PSALM 23: 1:
"THE LORD IS MY SHEPHERD, I SHALL NOT WANT"

IN Old Testament times most men were shepherds. Cities were few, and even agriculture was but little developed. The common lot was to make a living from flocks and herds, which were led about over great stretches of unfenced land owned in common by the people of a whole tribe. A shepherd was often alone for days with his sheep, and in the absence of other companions, made friends of them. While the American stockman commonly thinks of his flocks and herds only as so much property, and must drive them when he would change their location, the Oriental shepherd gives to every one of his flock a pet name, and they follow like dogs wherever he leads. The writer has seen a shepherd call his own sheep out of a mixed multitude of many flocks on the hills of Bethlehem. "They know his voice"; but the same word spoken by a stranger would only prompt them to run away in alarm. The Oriental shepherd often has occasion to rescue his sheep from beasts, and robbers, and torrents, and thickets, and so his very rod and club become dear to them. All this came into David's boyhood. He could not fail to remember that the great men of his nation had been shepherds—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses—and then he would think of God, the "Shepherd of Israel," who had led his people like a flock. Of that flock he seemed a lonely lamb on the hills, but the Divine Shepherd, who counts his sheep and knows them by name, he was assured, would not forget him. All that he was to his sheep—leader, provider, defender—God would be to him. And so, harp in hand, he sang: "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want. I shall not want rest or food. He maketh me to lie down in pastures of tender grass. I shall not want drink. He leadeth beside the waters of rest. I shall not want forgiveness. He reviveth my soul. I shall not want guidance. He leadeth me in the paths of rightness for his name's sake. I shall not want companionship and courage. Yea, though I walk through the valley of deepest darkness, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me. I shall not want comfort and defense. Thy rod and thy crook they comfort me. I shall not want victory. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies. I shall not want joy. Thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over. I shall not want anything in this world. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. I shall not want anything through all eternity. I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

Dr. Fairburn thinks this a psalm of David's boyhood, while Dr. Parker is sure it is an old man's psalm. Both may be right. It would seem as if David must have sung it first in boyhood, but some of its deepest notes he may have added in age. It is in any case equally the favorite of youth and age to-day.

Illustration and Application

I shall not want. Long years after the United States of America had won their freedom, an aged Indian, half naked and famished, wandered into one of the western settlements of "pale faces," begging for food to keep him from starving. He was eagerly devouring the bread a kind hand had given him, when there was noticed round his neck a bright colored ribbon, from which hung a small, dirty pouch. The poor old redskin was questioned as to what it was, and he stated that it was a charm given to him in his young days after he had been fighting for the United States. The giver of the bread asked to see it, whereupon the old Indian handed it over. On opening the pouch there was a faded, greasy paper. And what was it? It was a regular discharge from the army, entitling the Indian to a pension for life, and signed by George Washington himself.

So, many a man is going about with a starving soul, lacking joy and peace and hope, to whom has been given promises that, if he would but claim them, would make him rich for time and eternity. They that trust in the Lord shall not lack any good thing.

The rest of trust. He leadeth me by the waters of rest. Luther, in hours of anxiety about himself, and especially about his great cause, often found comfort from his caged bird, whose cheery notes seemed to say:

Luther, Luther, do not sorrow,
God provideth for to-morrow.

We need to learn the secret of strength, possessed by an old West African negress. She had a bad-tempered, heathen husband, and many difficulties in her Christian life. A missionary asked her if she was never tempted to deny the Lord.

"Oh, yes," she answered, "I be. But den, you see, I be the Lord Jesus' property. So when temptation comes 'long, I just looks up quick, and says, 'Great Massa, this property of yours be in danger.' An den he comes and looks after his property his own self. That's why I don't deny him."

Yea, though I walk through the valley of deepest darkness. Such was the valley through which hundreds of Chinese Christians were called to walk during the recent Boxer massacres. The stories of brave martyrdoms from the days of Roman and Roman Catholic persecutions have been matched with equal triumphs of faith in China, as witness the following instances, particularly appropriate to illustrate this Psalm of trust in God's leading hand:

The hot summer sun was shining with great power over Yen Shan, in China, one morning during the late Boxer rising and persecution of native Christians. In the corner of a large field there stood, surrounded by a group of fierce looking men, a letter-carrier named Fan. A hole was hastily dug, and into it, standing upright, they thrust the poor Chinese postman. Then they filled it up with earth to his knees.

"Renounce the foreigners' God," they cried, "and we will spare you." "I cannot," replied Fan firmly. The hole was filled up to above his hips, then a similar offer was made, but it was again decidedly refused. More earth was quickly shoveled in, till only the Chinaman's head was visible. "Now," said the Boxers, "swear to give up your new God and we will let you out, and you shall return to your wife and child." But the Christian answered, "I cannot deny the Lord I love, and who loves me." "Your last chance is gone," said his enemies, as they proceeded to bury him alive. "One more got rid of," said they, when they had finished. "One more received into glory," say we, as we read of Fan's loyalty to his Lord.

Let me tell you of another who witnessed for his Saviour in far-away Yen Shan. He was a gate-keeper, old and odd-looking, but he was known to be a true Christian. He was seized by the Boxers, who bid him sing, saying with taunts that they longed to hear his juvenile voice. A quick glance at them, as they stood round him, armed with swords, then he began to sing brightly, the translation of "He Leadeth Me."

E'en death's cold wave I will not flee,
Since God through Jordan leadeth me.

The men applauded loudly and bid him to strike up again. With tuneful heart but cracked old voice, he sang, "Heaven is My Home," to our tune of "Home, Sweet Home."

Can you not picture the scene? The large Chinese city bathed in sunshine. Those angry men, who truly "knew not what they did," surrounding God's aged servant, as with confident faith, and calm, unmoved face, he sang:

There at my Saviour's side,
I shall be glorified,
Heaven is my home.

Firmly and joyfully he went through each verse, then, after a round of applause the Boxers fell upon him. But their sword thrusts only sent him into the presence of the King whom, having not seen, he loved.

The above are but two instances of the way in which Chinese Christians who "were slain for the Word of God, and for the testimony which they held," glorified their living Lord. Over 230 were killed in Yen Shan city and county alone, and each one was "faithful unto death," some of them through terrible tortures.

Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me. Many a shepherd has died in rescuing his sheep, type in this of the Good Shepherd who "gave his life for the sheep."

"HE SHALL FEED HIS FLOCK LIKE A SHEPHERD."

"HE LEADETH ME BESIDE THE STILL WATERS."

THE STANDARD OF ISRAEL

A NOVEL PRESENTATION OF THE INSIGNIA OF THE TWELVE TRIBES

REV. E. T. SANFORD, of Hackensack, N. J., who recently visited the Holy Land, used in his pulpit a few days ago a unique design, to illustrate the old and new ensign of Israel. In the second chapter of Numbers, it reads: "Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house." The Jewish rabbins, who profess to be very particular in their descriptions of everything relating to the ancient customs of Israel, have given details of the standards used by the tribes. Dr. Louthenbourg has represented in a picture the shields of Israel piled together, with sword and spear laid aside, and the fruits of peace growing about them.

Mr. Sanford has arranged, in his design, the shields in the form of a cross. This is the ensign of spiritual Israel. The old story of Constantine and his vision of a cross, has influenced the world greatly in the adoption of a visible standard of the Christian faith. Maxentius, his enemy in Italy, had raised a revolt against Constantine, then in Britain. Constantine realized that, if he succeeded, he must appeal to the God of his mother-Helena, for Maxentius was an inveterate pagan, worshiping the Roman gods. While Constantine was praying in his tent, contemporary writers state, the whole army encamped on the plain of Piedmont, saw an effulgent cross in the heavens, and Latin words stating, "By this thou shalt conquer."

How appropriate the suggestion that, in the prophecy of Jacob dying, he gave also symbols, in his blessings upon his sons. "Joseph is a fruitful bough that hangeth over the wall," suggests a bunch of grapes for the standard of Ephraim, who, though a younger son of Joseph, yet received his blessing, and probably the right to use whatever belonged to Joseph, as one of Jacob's sons. "Benjamin shall raven as a wolf," makes the wolf an appropriate ensign of the tribe of Benjamin, which occupied a small section north of Jerusalem.

The tribe of Reuben has in the design a troubled sea. He was "unstable as water." Simeon and Levi had slain the people of Shechem, and a sword is an appropriate ensign for Simeon, as Levi is not numbered as the founder of one of the twelve tribes. Jacob, dying, said of them: "Instruments of cruelty are in their tents." Another shield of a son of Israel is in this design, and given the central place in the cross, for Christ is spoken of as "The lion of the tribe of Judah." Jacob said: "Judah is a lion's whelp." From Judah came the Christ.

"Issachar is an ass between two burdens." "Zebulun shall be a haven for ships." These two prophecies, concerning the younger children of Leah, by Jacob, have a significance, both in the naming of the children, and the land to be occupied by the tribe bearing the name.

Levi received no place as founder of a tribe, and it is appropriate, in his stead, to give Manasseh an ensign from the prophecy. "He shall become a fruitful people." What more fruitful than the date palm-tree that flourishes and bears much fruit? The children of Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, were Dan and Naphtali. Of these Jacob said in his blessing: "Dan shall be a serpent by the way;" "Naphtali is a hind let loose." These two ensigns, of serpent and deer, are accordingly placed upon the shields as an appropriate design for the tribes.

Ephraim—grapes	Zebulun—haven for ships
Benjamin—wolf	Manasseh—palm-tree
Reuben—sea	Dan—serpent
Simeon and Levi—sword	Naphtali—deer
Judah—lion	God—trees standard
Issachar—ass	Asher—royal dish

The two children of Zilpah, the handmaid of Leah, were Gad and Asher. Of Gad, Israel said: "A troop cometh." What more appropriate than that the ensign of such a troop should be a banner with stars upon it, for God had promised Abram that his seed should be as the stars for multitude, and he believed God, and "it was reckoned for righteousness." Of Asher, dying Israel said: "He shall yield royal dainties." On the side of the foot-hills of Lebanon, next to the great sea, Asher dwelt in peace, and doubtless contributed often to the comfort and pleasure of Solomon and other kings of Israel.

These shields, in the form of the Cross, make a standard about which every spiritual son of Abraham should rally.

"Force-Thoughts"

By SUNNY JIM

THERE'S one thought that does me more good than all the others that ever came to me. It is this: there's only one thing to be done at a time!

¶Nothing new about this, but think what it means when things pile up ahead and one begins to think there's more to do than can be done and begins to worry, which is next to the worst thing in the world, and to worry, which is worst thing.

¶"One thing at a time" takes all the tangles out of a day's work, all the perplexity out of a day's thought, and put into the day's living that self-confidence that is worth everything else.

¶It properly begins when you get up in the morning and it keeps you from trying to solve seven of the day's difficulties while tying your cravat—which is a bad thing, for the seven remain unsolved and the cravat carries all day the same kink in it that mars your temper.

¶Begin with your breakfast—make it a "FORCE" breakfast and treat it with the respect due to the one thing you are doing at that time.

¶The rest of the day you'll find it easier to

THE NARROW GATE

By REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

Author of "IN HIS STEPS"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place "with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters the bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them being Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Mr. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he firmly declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper, which creates sensation, and brings to its side many new friends.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty local school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and pressman. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, on the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reforms are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to carry on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spellbound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. The picnic is declared a phenomenal success.

CHAPTER VII.—Continued.

"WILL Sage do anything about Jake's firing at him?" asked Quits.

"No. But I don't believe Jake will ever come out to a temperance picnic again."

Mr. Edwards was mistaken.

Jake Lawson figured in more than one of farmer Sage's picnics. But he was allowed to go his way this time, for all Colby was soon roused over another event, which made vital history for the Beacon and changed the current of public sentiment to a very marked degree.

In the following week's issue of the Beacon, Douglas wrote up the day's experience at Sage's grove, and followed it up the week after, by urging a pledge-signing crusade all over the county. At the request of very many of Mr. Sage's neighbors, and especially of Mr. Sage himself, he printed the temperance story in the Beacon, making four instalments of it, retaining Jake Lawson's name, as it appeared in the reading. A copy of the paper was sent to Lawson, and Douglas heard through other sources that he was enraged at the quantity and style of advertising he was receiving.

Friday night of that week, Douglas went out of the office about ten o'clock in the evening, to go to his room for some proofs he had taken home with him. Of late he had been in the habit of staying down at the office Fridays, until nearly midnight.

He had just reached his room, which was at the Wycoff's, when he felt a tremendous explosion that jarred all the windows, and was followed by a duller sound like a falling wall.

He ran down stairs and out on the street. Already the sidewalks were lined with terrified, excited people.

"What is it?" Douglas asked the first man he ran into.

"I don't know."

"Down town," some one else said.

Douglas started to run down to the office.

As he ran, he heard some one say the explosion, or whatever it was, was in the vicinity of the Beacon office.

But when he reached the spot he was wholly unprepared for the sight that greeted him, and the large crowd gathered there.

The entire front of the Beacon office was blown out, as clean as if it had been removed a stick at a time by hand. Inside, the smoke and plaster dust were still so dense that little was plainly visible, but as the dust settled, the ruin looked ghastly. One small portion of the old press was sticking to a corner of the room where it had been blown, and the flooring of the room overhead, which had been used as a storage for furniture, had been torn away, letting piles of shattered furniture through gaping holes as large as a wagon. The entire office was wrecked completely, the press ruined, and the type, paper, and fixtures scattered across the street, and shattered against the adjoining building.

But the first thought that Douglas had was not concerning the building. His heart stood still as he thought of Quits and George. The next minute he had dashed into the wrecked office calling out their names, a great fear seizing him as he ran and called.

CHAPTER VIII

DOUGLAS had not taken half a dozen steps into the wrecked building before he stumbled over a pile of broken furniture and fell down. Before he could regain his feet some one had taken hold of him and was lifting him up. It was Mr. Edwards, who, with several men, had rushed into the building behind Douglas.

"Quits! George!" Douglas stammered. Mr. Edwards understood in a moment, and together he and Douglas climbed over a pile of rubbish and through a tangled heap of confused and ruined chairs, tables, and office fixtures.

At the extreme rear of the room near the back door, Douglas and Mr. Edwards found George, pinned down under a part of the old press, and evidently just beginning to regain consciousness. As they lifted off the weight from his body he opened his eyes, and said with a gleam of his old habits, "What hit me? The office towel?"

Douglas could not help smiling, even as he kneeled over the boy and wiped some blood and grime from his face.

"Are you hurt, George? It's a miracle you're alive. Where are you hurt?"

Douglas was feeling of him to see if any bones were broken. George sat up and opened his eyes wider, and Douglas heard him mutter, "The old press is a goner this time. It seemed to have a great attachment for me," he added, as he looked down and saw the fragment that had fallen upon him.

"Where is Quits?" Douglas asked, his fears for George quite dispelled, but his anticipation of a fatality to the pressman was keen and strong as he listened to Mr.

Edwards and the rest searching for him in the ruins.

George grinned, and although his inky face, covered with blood and plaster was not particularly beautiful, Douglas thought at the time that it was unusually attractive.

"Quits isn't in it with me. He stepped out of the office five minutes before the ball opened, to go up to Jake's Place and persuade Joe Roberts to come out. You know he's been after Joe for some time. My! But ain't I glad he ain't killed with me!" George uttered the words with a smile, but the next moment he fell over and fainted away. When they carried him out, Mr. Edwards insisted on having him taken to his house. Once there it was found that he had sustained a fracture of one leg below the knee, besides numerous cuts about the head and body.

Quits came in a few moments later, while Douglas and Edwards and Vernon were together with the doctor at the Edwards' house.

He knew nothing of the explosion nor its cause. He had gone up to Jake's Place to find Joe Roberts, a young man in whom he had become interested at the boarding-house. He had stepped into Jake's Place, but had not found the boy there. Jake himself was behind the bar, and gave Quits a scowl as he passed out to search for Joe in one of the other saloons. Then came the explosion, and Quits had rushed with everybody else to the scene of it, but not before George had been taken out and carried up to the house.

Mrs. Edwards nursed George as if she had been his own mother. The next day, resting comfortably with his leg in a cast and various interesting bandages adding to the general picturesqueness of his head and countenance, the boy told all he knew about the accident.

"Just after Quits went out I went to the back of the office to use the trimmer. Something went wrong with the lever, and I was under the thing on my knees (not praying, Mr. Douglas, but sort of asking a blessing on the old machine), when it seemed to me as if a comet lit in the front end of the office and the room was as bright as glory. Then there was a fizzing sound like a soda water fountain, only different, and next minute, before I had time to get out from under the trimmer, the whole office seemed to lift right up under me and the comet seemed to be having a prize fight with a cyclone. Something hit me below the belt, and that's all I remember until Mr. Douglas was looking at me."

"It was a good thing for you, George, that you were under the old trimmer when the comet went off. The frame of the trimmer broke the fall of stuff over you and probably saved your life."

"The old trimmer owed me a good turn, Mr. Douglas. Many's the time I've doctored it when it was on its last legs from paralysis and heart failure. But what'll we do now? Even Quits can't mend up the press now, can he?"

"Hardly," said Quits gravely, with a smile of regard for George. "But we hope to mend you up all right. What do we care for the press when you are saved?"

"No! You could get plenty of boys if I had been pied for good," said George, pretending indifference. "But what'll the Beacon do now, Mr. Douglas? We can't get out even a meat-market edition now."

"I don't know yet what we'll do," Douglas replied soberly, "I'm so thankful that you and Quits were not killed that I haven't thought much about the future of the paper."

"It wouldn't be hard to guess where that 'comet' came from," Mr. Edwards said.

"We can't prove anything," Mr. Vernon added. "Our parsonage at Leander was partly wrecked one night by a bomb or something. It was almost a moral certainty that the whisky men were at the bottom of the outrage, as they have been proved to be in scores of such cases in this country, but we could never prove it. Quits himself is witness that Jake was in his saloon only a few minutes before, so he personally could not have had anything to do with the explosion. And it is just as certain, too, that Douglas has not been keeping a supply of comets and bombs lying around loose in the Beacon office."

"Whoever caused it, one thing is very certain, said Douglas, "the loss to the Beacon is complete. There isn't a dollar's worth of property left. Even our subscribers' lists are missing, and we have no duplicate or copy."

The men were silent. Esther came into the room. She had been with Douglas and Mr. Edwards to look at the ruin and had just returned in time to hear George's story.

"Are you going to give up?" she said to Douglas, as she had said that night after the election, when he had let her know his feeling towards her.

"No, not if I can get anything at all to print a paper with. But what can I do without a press or type, or a place to work? I cannot make bricks without clay and straw, too."

"I believe the way will open up for you," said Mr. Edwards, cheerfully. "I don't see how, myself; but I believe it will. There's that store-room of Clark's down by the depot. I'll see if you can't get that for temporary use anyhow."

"How much would a new press cost?" asked Esther.

Douglas looked at her and hesitated.

"I couldn't get anything worth while short of six hundred dollars."

Esther went out of the room, and Douglas looked embarrassed. She came back in a few moments, and going right up to Douglas put something into his hands. "There's one hundred dollars towards it," she said, with a smile.

Douglas turned red. Then he put the money back into Esther's hands, with a sudden gesture.

"I can't take your money, Esther. It isn't fair. The idea of a big grown-up man like me dependent on a girl for his business."

"But you have already established a precedent, sir," replied Esther, smiling at him, "by being dependent on this same girl before."

"I know I have," Douglas answered desperately. "But that's just it. I don't feel as if it was at all the thing to do." Douglas was in real distress over it, but Esther smiled and laid the money down on the table.

"I have offered it to you in good faith, and I don't see why it isn't just as good as if you had to borrow of somebody and pay high interest."

"I would feel different about it, it—if—" Douglas stammered.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

C. A. C., London, Ont. How long would the human family live if nothing grew after this date, or, in other words, how long would the human family live on the food already at hand? I heard an eminent divine say six weeks. I read sixteen months.

Any answer to the foregoing must be largely conjectural. It would seem reasonable, however, to conclude, as each season usually produces little more than is needed for consumption during the interval between crops, that the world's food supply on hand would be practically exhausted within a year, and that the race would then quickly perish of starvation. This is borne out by the experience in great famines, where the serious suffering and mortality begin with the total failure of a new crop.

Reader, Lake Geneva, Wis. 1. Can a woman be a Christian and paint her face? 2. Is it right for any one to uphold another that is lazy?

1. See Jer. 4: 30, Ezek. 23: 40. 2. See II. Thess. 3: 10. These hold equally good to-day.

H. W. H., Vassalboro, Me. In the event of one whose sins have been forgiven, falling again into grievous sin, and dying in impenitence, would he be required to answer to God for the sins committed before his conversion which had been blotted out?

We cannot look on the punishment for sin in the same light as we regard punishment by our courts for crime—so many years for embezzlement, so many years for burglary, etc. Sin involves exclusion from God's presence, from the society of the good, from the joys of heaven. Those who die unpardoned go to the place reserved for them, and though doubtless there are degrees of punishment, they are probably to a great extent affected by the remorse of the sufferer. In such a case as you mention, if it is possible, which many doubt, we could imagine that the remorse would be very terrible, as the man remembered how different his condition would have been, had he been faithful, and how stupendous is his guilt in sinning after having once been pardoned. Our Saviour's words about weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth would apply to his case. The only Scripture we remember, bearing exactly on the terms of your question, is the parable of the unmerciful servant (Matt. 18: 32-35).

W. R. G., Linkwood, Md., writes, apropos of the Macedonian massacres:

I have not the shadow of a doubt, that if all the Christians in the United States, or even all who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were to earnestly pray to God ten minutes three times a day, with the earnestness of David, in a very short time he would put a hook in this Moslem monster's nose that would prevent him from continuing his bloody work.

W. M. H., Lidgewood, N. D. Do you think it right, or honest, to add to the Lord's prayer, "For thine is the kingdom, the power," etc., when Jesus did not add those words?

We are not sure that Jesus did not add those words. The revisers, taking the balance of probability, omit them, but they say in the margin, that "many authorities, some ancient, add them." They are so appropriate, and so thoroughly in harmony with Christ's teachings that it would not surprise us to learn that in the earliest authorities of all, if we had them, we should find them standing as a part of the prayer. Ministers, no doubt, use them from long habit, and may drop them as the Revised Version becomes more familiar, but we fail to see anything wrong or dishonest in their use, for they ascribe the kingdom, the power and the glory to Him to whom they rightfully belong.

H. A. S., North Bridgeton, Me. If one sets apart a life subscription of $10 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it goes, as you have explained, to Mont-Lawn, is he entitled to count any part of it as the Lord's work, or should he consider it as an investment for his personal advantage, since he gets the full value of his money and the credit for his gift besides?

It is the Lord's work, since it all goes direct to Mont-Lawn, which is a Christian charity, conducted on spiritual lines, for the moral and physical well-being of the children of the tenements. It is, in a broad sense, a missionary work, in a most needy field. The gift of the paper is our contribution, in recognition of the donor's generosity to the children's work.

Reader, Detroit, Mich. Please tell me, if ministers are required to adhere to the standards of their churches, why are they not taken to task by the authorities when they openly advocate Sunday base-ball, Sunday golf, Sunday "smokers" for young men, and Sunday picnics and driving? Also, how are they allowed, unchallenged, to take on the characteristics of other churches, as Presbyterianism copying Episcopalianism, the former outdoing the latter in many cases, keeping Passion week, vespers, and Easter, with orchestral music?

Where there is a regularly organized church government in any denomination, it is possible to keep the pastors of that denomination well within the church standards, both as to the form of services and as to Christian life and conduct generally. There are, however, denominations where each church is practically independent of control by any governing body, and whose preachers are responsible to their congregations. Those ministers who are under denominational authority, and who offend in the manner indicated, should be called to account by their church boards, their bishops, etc., while those who are under no such authority should be held directly answerable by their congregations for all violations of the recognized standards of Christian conduct, whether such violations relate to Sabbath breaking or to the introduction of forms, customs and observances in worship that are opposed to the traditions of Protestantism.

F. T., Faugallie, Fla. How can a person get permanent victory over a propensity to sin? I am assailed by temptation, I resist for a time, but eventually fall. I pray and try again, only to be again overcome. Is there no remedy?

There is no patent remedy that can be taken like medicine to ensure your victory. You have to deal with your case with your ordinary common sense working with your faith. You are assured that God can and will give you all the strength you need for your conflict, but he expects you to use it. He expects you to resist, and promises that you shall have strength not your own; but if you do not continue to fight he does not help you. He does not lift you to the top of the mountain, but he will give you strength to climb to the top. Settle it well in your own mind that this strength is yours, and you will fight with a brave heart. Watch yourself. See what circumstances, or books, or pictures bring on an assault of the tempter and avoid those. See if any particular mode of life or kind of diet is followed by temptation, and avoid it. Do all you can as a sensible man to defeat the enemy and, above all, lay fast hold of the invincible power God promises you and you will surely overcome.

Christian Shingle House, Pa. How will God judge people of this age and all those of early times who have had no opportunity of learning the way of salvation?

He who is merciful as well as just, you may be sure, will do what is right in their case. God does not satisfy our curiosity about matters that do not concern us. He expects that we will trust him to act justly. Our duty is to make use of the light we have for ourselves, and to see to it that as far as our power goes, we will send the Gospel to those who have it not. For your consolation, if there is a personal reason for your concern, we may remind you of the Apostle Paul's statement (Rom. 2: 14-16) that men will be judged according to the light they had. Also our Lord's own words (Luke 12: 48) that "he that knew not and did commit things worthy of stripes shall be beaten with few stripes."

Inquirer, Charlotteville, N. Y. Is it true that the signs of Christ's coming have all been fulfilled?

If you mean his coming to the earth to reign in millennial glory, they have not. We gather from his own words, there are two stages of his coming. In the first stage, he appears only to those who are looking for him and longing for him. Those will be withdrawn from the world (see Matt. 24: 37-44). Then will come the time of the Great Tribulation, when the vials spoken of in the Apocalypse will be poured out, and there will be a time of trouble such as the world has not seen. At the end of that time Christ will appear in glory and his reign will begin. Nothing remains to be fulfilled before the first stage of his coming, but much before the second.

Mrs. E. M. D., Massillon, O. I note by the papers that Dowie and his followers are to be in your city for a limited time. Can you not give your readers an unprejudiced and fair description of their doings, their religion, and the kind of people they are?

We did so in last week's issue, where the story of the invasion of New York by the Zion Church was given at considerable length, and without bias or prejudice. We believe that if Dowie's work is of God, it will prosper and endure; if not, it will disappear.

Reader, Rochester, N. Y. Is beer really a tonic, or does it possess nutriment, as some assert?

The ablest living authorities affirm that far from being a tonic, it destroys the appetite for food and nourishment, and produces cancer, and kidney and heart trouble, and degeneration of all the organs; that beer drinkers are incapable of resisting disease; and that it diminishes strength, instead of increasing it.

The Story of Three Converts

LAST Friday evening there was present at the weekly devotional class meeting in the Bowery Mission a gentleman whom I had noticed several times in our evening congregations. I found he was a Christian of several years' standing, and had only recently arrived in New York City. The Bowery Mission was one of the first places he had visited, and the cause of his doing so was a remarkable testimony that he had heard during his recent stay in London, England. At a religious gathering in that city, a Bowery mission convert related how wonderfully God had delivered him from a life of sin in "the old lighthouse on the Bowery." This man spoke with such enthusiastic gratitude of the blessings he had received in the Mission, that he had come to be known as "Mr. Bowery." Said the gentleman, "I felt as though I must lose no time in seeing such a wonderful place."

A little group of Christian workers were holding an open-air meeting on the streets of San Francisco. The crowds surged past, careless and indifferent. The noise of traffic made it almost impossible to secure a hearing. The exhortations, the singing of the hymns, the prayers seemed to be wasted effort amid that din and Babel of noise. Just when it seemed impossible for the devoted little band to keep back the spirit of disappointment, a great, stalwart fellow, of six feet stature, stepped among them, and in a voice of tremendous power that could be heard above all the roar of the street, gave his testimony. He was a soldier, just landed from the Philippines, where, amid many vicissitudes and temptations, he had for the last two and a-half years faithfully witnessed for Christ. Three and a-half years ago he had entered New York City a homeless, desolate tramp. He had found his way, as so many do, to the Bowery; he had been drawn into the Mission, and in a state of utter wretchedness and want he had given himself to God. After twelve months spent in the city, during which he had become one of the most faithful and devoted workers at the Mission, he had enlisted and been despatched to the Philippines. And now, on his arrival again in the United States, one of his first acts was to testify on the streets of San Francisco of the fact of his glorious salvation.

One winter night, about three years ago, a party of half-intoxicated sailors came strolling up the Bowery. They were out for fun. They had visited several saloons, music halls, and shooting galleries, and had arrived at a condition of extremely hilarious frolicsomeness. Passing the door of the Mission, they were attracted by the lights, and through the windows saw the great crowd of men inside. They stopped, and as the door happened to open at the moment, they heard the sound of singing, and drew nearer to the glass swinging-doors. Mike Murphy, the one of the group nearest the door, was gazing as intently at the picture inside as his befuddled brain would allow him, when one of his comrades behind gave him a push, and through the door he went flying, and lay sprawling on the floor. On picking himself up, he took a seat and listened to the remainder of the hymn that was being sung, and enjoyed it so much that he stayed during the rest of the meeting. When his companions besought him to rejoin them he refused point-blank. That night he became converted. He spent the rest of his furlough at the Mission. When the time came for his ship to leave, he refused to join it. An active, able-bodied seaman, capable of earning good wages, he begged to be allowed, for a time, to work for nothing as one of the Mission helpers, in order that he might remain under Christian influence until he felt himself thoroughly established. Just at that time Dr. Klopsch had ordered heavy repairs to the Mission floor. Mike Murphy undertook to do the work. He did it well. Then, after several months, he left us to pursue his seafaring occupation. Whenever possible he has visited us, and he is always a welcome guest. His smiling face, his stentorian voice, his Irish brogue and Irish wit, his honest and genuine devotion to Christ and the Mission, have endeared him to us all.

This week a letter has been received from Bombay, telling us he had traveled 14,000 miles within the last few months, and that he expects to be home with us for Christmas. He promises to tell us of the Missions he has visited in different places, and concludes his letter by saying, "I am holding on to the Cross, and hope with God's blessing to remain a Christian and a member of the Bowery Mission Rescue League."

THE LIFE OF TRUST

The Keynote of David's Career is Confidence in God

By Mrs. M. Baxter

It is very noticeable how often the word trust occurs in the Psalms. The second Psalm ends with the words, "Blessed are all they that put their trust in him." Ps. 4: 5 says, "Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, and put your trust in the Lord." Ps. 5: 11: "Let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice." Ps. 7: 1; 11: 1; 15: 1; 25: 2; 56: 11, etc.: "In thee do I put my trust." Ps. 9: 10: "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee." Ps. 13: 5: "I have trusted in thy mercy." Ps. 18: 2: "In him will I trust." Ps. 22: 4, 5, 8: "Our fathers trusted in thee; they trusted, and thou didst deliver them. . . . they trusted in thee, and were not confounded." And then the words prophetical of Christ upon the cross, when the chief priests quoted the words of David in mockery of their Messiah: "He trusted in the Lord that he would deliver him; let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him." And then the word which shows how our Lord, he of whom it is written, "When he cometh into the world he saith, . . . Lo, I am come . . . to do thy will, O God" (Heb. 10: 5, R.V.), says in this Psalm: "Thou didst make me trust when I was upon my mother's breasts" (Ps. 22: 9, R.V.). It would be worth while to go through the Psalms and find every place where trust is mentioned.

What was it which caused in David such a constant and such a deep trust in God? Here is the answer, "I sought the Lord, and he answered me, and delivered me from all my fears." "Everyone . . . that seeketh findeth," says our Lord (Matt. 7: 8). And when David found the Lord, he found him to be a Shepherd, who made himself as responsible for him as he was responsible for his father's sheep. Therefore he could look forward and say, "Because the Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want; in time or in eternity; in spirit, soul, or body; in whatsoever circumstances I may be placed, in green pastures and by still waters, or in the valley of the shadow of death, he who has taken the responsibility of me will not and cannot fail me." This was his safety when he undertook the single combat, first in private with the lion and the bear, and then in public with the Philistine giant.

It was this confidence in his Shepherd which kept him under the many home trials which must have arisen through the jealousy of his elder brothers, who smarted under the fact that their natural strength and talents, and their priority of birth, was passed by, and that the God of Israel had chosen their youngest brother. The scene on the battlefield, when Eliab reproached David with such insulting words, lets us into the state of things in the family life of David at this time. He came, sent by his father, to carry a present to his soldier brothers; and when his heart burned with indignation that the Philistine giant should defy the armies of the living God, Eliab taunted him, and said, "Why art thou come down? And with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride and the haughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle" (I. Sam. 17: 28).

They were bitter words; but David could trust them over to his Shepherd, and be free from personal feeling to serve his God in this crisis of his people's history. If he had been in the habit of defending himself at home from the unjust charges and insinuations of his brethren, he would have been too pre-occupied with a wounded spirit now to be fully at the Lord's disposal for single combat with Goliath. David trusted; he knew that the Lord was his Shepherd, and that he should not want for power and skill to strike the blow which should deliver Israel at this moment. And his envious brothers must be witnesses of that courage and faith in their young brother, which proved that God's election of the incipient king was a just one.

In his relations with King Saul, who was still more jealous than his brothers had been, David trusted in and obeyed the Lord his Shepherd. Only once did he fail in his firm confidence that he should "not want" for safety, even when Saul ten times sought to slay him.

PERSONAL TESTIMONY*

The Duty of Every Christian to Seek the Conversion of Souls

OUR Lord's direction to the man of Gadara, whom he had healed, and who wanted to follow him, was, "Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee." It was very natural that the man should want to be with Jesus after being delivered. He would not only desire it through gratitude, but because he would feel safer when with him. "But Jesus suffered him not." Young converts are in the same position. It would be far more pleasant to attend meetings and enjoy the peace and rest of the church than to go out and tell their experience to unsympathetic ears; but that is not Christ's will for those whom he saves. He would have them testify for him. That is the way his kingdom has grown. The man who can declare that Jesus has saved him, that his own experience is a proof of Divine power, commands the confidence of his hearers. It is no theory that he presents, but actual facts. Like a man who has been cured by a certain physician, or by a certain medicine, he is the best of all witnesses to speak to people similarly afflicted.

There is a tendency, far too prevalent, to leave the propagation of the Gospel exclusively to the ministers. It is every Christian's duty to help in the work. Opportunities are continually occurring, which can be turned to account with greater effect than the minister can produce. In the factory, the office, and in society, are people with whom we come in contact who need deliverance. It is a kindness to them, as well as a duty to Christ, to tell them of the way. A word from a man whom they know, a man who has no interest of his own to serve, who is not a professional advocate, will have weight with them. The first convert won to Christ was won by his own brother. Andrew "first found his own brother Simon and brought him to Jesus." How thankful afterwards Peter must have been to Andrew for that service! It is a service that all can render. It does not need eloquence nor power; it simply requires earnestness of purpose. If every Christian would do it with one soul, the number of Christians would be immediately doubled; and there is scarcely a Christian anywhere who does not know of one unconverted soul whom he might reach. The result of his testimony he may leave to God, but the testimony ought to be given, whether men will listen or not.

*Topic of the Epworth League for November 15: John 1: 35-46; Acts 8: 26; Acts 10.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Eleanor Lee, a new story by Margaret E. Sangster, like all of that popular author's books, is exceedingly clever and well written. It is the story of a young woman who spends her life in the effort to redeem her husband, whom she loves devotedly and who, though he has many faults, also possesses some good points that make the attempt worth while. The gentle, high-bred wife hides her husband's shame through years of untold suffering. At last the battle is won and happiness returns to the distracted household. It is a story told with a strong dramatic force and realism, that must appeal to all who have ever witnessed the wreck of a home through drink and its evil train.

In her characters, Mrs. Sangster is singularly felicitous and enjoyable. Donald Waugh is a fine type of honorable manhood, with a high purpose keep steadily in view; and his sister Rachel, as the friend and counsellor of the suffering wife, has an important part to play. Kathleen, Aunt Polly, and several others move in the living picture of the plot to make it still more entertaining. Waugh, the rejected suitor of Eleanor, who has remained a steadfast friend amid all her troubles, becomes rich, and with his sister, who shares his ideals, begins a career of rare practical philanthropy. We might tell of his benevolent project of a "Hall of Rest" for the worthy poor, but we must let the readers find out these things and unravel the plot of this splendid story for themselves. Eleanor Lee is handsomely bound in cloth with gold stamp, 322 pages, with frontispiece. Price $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Co., New York, London and Chicago, publishers.

The Life of a Wooden Doll, by Lewis Saxby. This is one of the oddest and most amusing books for the young folks that has come to our notice in a long time. It presents the career of a wooden doll, with all its many laughable and absurd vicissitudes, and the interest is heightened by the fact that the illustrations—there are some thirty full page ones and many smaller—are all, so to speak, photographed "from the life," showing Miss Dolly and her wooden friends at housekeeping and at play, at a party, in her auto, at market, in the barnyard, the garden, camping and celebrating the "Glorious Fourth." A great book for the young folks and a sure mirth-provoker and innocent entertainer. The book is finely printed on heavy paper, and with stiff board covers. Price $1.25. Fox, Duffield & Co., New York, publishers.

ABOLITION OF THE SALOON*

How Young Christians May Aid in Making the Business Unprofitable

EVERY man has one sure means of fighting the saloon, in working to deprive it of its customers. The larger measure of getting rid of it altogether, requires organization and systematic work; but individuals can act singly and do effective service by persuading their friends and acquaintances to stop the drinking of intoxicating liquors. There would be no need to make any demonstration against a saloon, if every one in the community in which it is situated, would abstain. The saloon would then be starved out, and would abolish itself of its own accord.

One of the chief evils of the saloon, is that it encourages the practice of drinking by its attractiveness and its sociability. The workingman, with his week's wages in his pocket, on his way to his poor home, often close, dull and uncomfortable, finds it difficult to pass the saloon, brightly illuminated, resplendent with mirrors, its bar crowded with genial patrons. Many a man would reach home with his wages intact, if his way did not lie by the door of one of these places. It is in such contrast with his home, that even though he may not be thirsty, the pleasure of being in so splendid a place, in lively society, is a fascination often too strong to be resisted. We have a right to complain of this fascination, which directly tends to make drunkards of men who wish to be sober. It is bad enough that the man who does wish to drink, should find so many drinking places offering him facilities, but it is cruel to license houses which incite and appeal to the public. To stop their evil work, however, is a contract too large to be undertaken single-handed. It needs the firm and resolute effort of the whole community.

Members of our young people's societies may, however, diminish the number of saloons by setting the example of never entering one, under any pretext, and by earnestly striving to persuade others to follow their example. Every man won to the cause of total abstinence makes one prospective patron the less, and thus the double good is done of arming another against temptation, and to that extent reducing the number of the saloon's customers and cutting down its profits.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society and Baptist Young People's Union for November 15. Ephesians 6: 10-13.

The Christian League of Philadelphia

THE Christian League of Philadelphia for eight years has been successfully combating the forces of evil in that city. In a quiet, persistent, practical way marvelous changes have been effected. Old slum districts have been transformed; dangerous neighborhoods have become decent and orderly, and temptations are removed from the pathway of youth. These things are accomplished in co-operation with the authorities. The league represents all evangelical denominations, including, as president, Rev. George D. Baker, D.D., of the Presbyterian Church; as vice-presidents, Bishop O. W. Whitaker, of the Protestant Episcopal Church; Bishop Cyrus D. Foss of the Methodist Episcopal Church; Rev. Dr. Russell H. Conwell of the Baptist Church; Rev. Edwin Heyl Delk, of the Lutheran Church; Major William H. Lambert, of the Congregational Church; and as directors, other representative clergymen and laymen of the Philadelphia evangelical churches. Mr. J. H. Converse, 500 N. Broad street, is treasurer. The league is sustained by voluntary contributions.

Mrs. Bird and the Bowery Waifs

Christian Endeavor Societies can aid Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree entertainment at the Bowery Mission for the poor children of the East Side very materially, by undertaking to provide some of the gifts which are handed to the children at the close of the entertainment. There are generally fifteen or sixteen hundred children crowded into the Mission hall, whilst between five and ten thousand unfortunate ones are left outside. Every child inside receives a gift of an orange, a bag of candy, and a book or toy suitable to the age, and then as far as possible the children outside are reached and made happy. This necessitates an enormous number of dolls, books, toys, games and useful articles, such as mittens, children's shawls, etc. Mrs. Bird, who can be addressed at 211 Clinton street, New York City, will be glad to receive promises of help, either in providing the above articles, or of cash donations for that purpose.

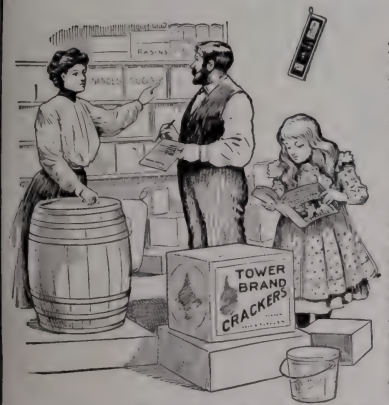
Modern Merchandising



Have you ever stopped to think about the question of getting your household supplies to the best advantage? Are you perfectly satisfied with the way things are running—with the prices you pay, the quality of the goods, the range of selection and the general question of making both ends meet? Perhaps you buy your supplies from the cross-roads store, just because your grandfather did. Perhaps you are tied up to the general store because you can trade it your butter and eggs at a low price and take it out in trade at a high price. Possibly you have never thought about it one way or the other. It is time to think. You have got to live and support your family. Your income is limited to so many dollars per year, and you have got to figure out the expense account so that things will come out right at the end of the year. If you can make both ends meet nicely and lay aside a tidy sum for a rainy day, you are only doing what every head of a family should endeavor to do, and if you don't do it you are simply inviting misery for the next time the crop fails. If a dollar looks as big to you as we think it does, we want you to think over this question of modern merchandising and see just what it means. It means different things to different people. To some it means buying everything on credit, then mortgaging the farm when settlement day comes around. Others think it means the pathway to economy—the cheap, worthless trash that is advertised so brazenly at the lowest price on earth. Many people send off to the city and get a jack knife at a 25 cents saving, and then fall back into the old rut in buying the balance of their supplies. One broad problem merchandising is to supply all your wants—everything you eat, wear or use—for yourself, your family and the hired man at an average saving of 15 to 40 per cent, which means that if your yearly purchases amount to $200 you can save something like $75; if it takes you $400 a year to live. Are you so well off that $100 or even $50 does not interest you? Then give consider the advantages. Assurance of reliable merchandise of the very best quality, and an unlimited range of selection. New goods. Prompt service. Prices that show economy, and the certain knowledge that absolute satisfaction is the keynote to every transaction. To make trading with us possible we issue a mammoth catalogue of 1128 pages, in which almost everything imaginable, including Vehicles and Farm Implements, is illustrated, described and priced. This catalogue can be absolutely depended upon and enables you to select your entire bill of merchandise without leaving your home, and with the certainty that everything will be found exactly as described or you need not keep it. We ask you to get out of your present rut and give our methods a trial. We satisfy others and will satisfy you. There never was a better time than right now to begin, for we have just issued a new catalogue full of the things you will need to see you through this winter, and you can make no better investment than to fill out this coupon and send it to us now while the subject is in your mind. We ask 15 cents, merely as an evidence of your faith in your part. If you will risk 15 cents, we will risk sending you a catalogue that costs us over half a dollar to print and mail, so big that it requires 24 cents postage. It is our 76 cents against your 15 cents. Will you do it? Write today.

THIRTY DAYS IN THE SADDLE

A Woman's Ride Across Iceland

By Jessie Ackerman

FAR off the usual line of travel, with shores swept by the Gulf Stream in winter, and bathed in the glory of the midnight sun in summer, lies Iceland, an island, with 78,000 hospitable inhabitants, who are almost as familiar with the outside world and its doings as we are with our own country. Accepting a kindly extended invitation to visit these people in their island home, I left the north of Scotland, and after sixteen days of rough, stormy voyaging in circumnavigating the island, I finally landed in the southern capital. A committee had been appointed to go to the steamer and extend me a welcome. The gentlemen all spoke English, and one of them, noting my unusual size,* exclaimed:

"I did not expect to find you so long."

This was my introduction to the Icelandic people, for whom I entertain unbounded esteem and great appreciation.

Arrangements had been made and rooms secured at the only hotel in the city, and I was made comfortable in every particular. The following day the governor, his wife, and a number of leading citizens, called to "pay their respects," and personally bid me welcome.

How can one tell of this strange country!—treeless, barren, rocky, with mighty volcanoes, vast lava stretches, mountain ranges and ever-flowing streams, fed by the melting snows, that make beautiful the whole landscape.

These people fled from religious persecution in the early centuries—from "Eric the Red" of Norway—and settled upon the island in the hope of religious freedom. They established a form of national life, adopting an unusual cut of dress, evolving a language all their own, formulating a code of laws that were to be handed to posterity as a sacred heritage. After all the centuries, they are still primitive, but not crude. Many speak from three to ten languages, and, as a whole, they are probably the most highly educated people of any land. Their school system is free from political domination and is so planned as to extend educational advantages to the most remote child. Caring very little for wealth and never burdened with the problem of "stocks, bonds and investments," they have given much time to self-culture and inner development. There is probably not a man on the island worth $5,000; but there is no poverty, and none of the extremes that are met with in other lands.

So great was my interest in them, that, after a month at the capital city, I decided to cross the island on horseback, going by way of the great geysers, the goldfass (a waterfall), and through the "chasm of the people," to the old Thingvalla. There are neither hotels nor cities after leaving the coast. There are no roads of any description; conveyances would be worse than useless, and the only way of getting about is on horseback over bridle-trails. These are frequently lost in the heavy marsh; and when the sun streams from every angle at all times, it is difficult to keep one's bearings.

With a guide, an escort, and a small boy, I left the capital city. It was an unusual sight. For so long a journey—a thirty days' ride—it was necessary to take a large band of riding horses, seventeen in number. They are only two hands higher than the Shetland pony, and over the rough roads they must be changed every two hours.

Besides these, three pack-horses carried my provisions and belongings. It was my plan to sleep in churches or farm-houses, and manage as best I could without tents.

A very pretty custom obtains among the people of the capital, when a visitor comes who is more or less known. Upon departure from any place, the citizens form themselves into an escort, and ride some miles out of the city. A long train men and women, all mounted on fine ponies, rode fifteen miles toward the north to see me well on the way. It was a jolly, happy company, keeping time to the clatter of the hoofs in laughter and song, until the "reign of the sun" warned them that it was time to return.

After twelve hours in the saddle, we rode up to a farm-house, and asked the kind-hearted farmer to keep us for the night, which he cheerfully did, placing the very best room at my disposal. Every house, no matter how poor the farmer may be, has a guest-chamber. There was great difficulty in a number of places for the people are of small stature, and it took some calculation and experimenting in order to adjust myself to the limited sleeping quarters. I tried to fit in every possible way, but it was useless; not even "on the bias" could I manage it. When my feet were in bed, my head was out, and the labor of adjustment became burdensome.

The island is almost treeless. I saw two trees of the mountain ash family. One, over a hundred years old, was less than six feet high. Lumber for building is brought from Denmark, landed on the coast, and carried inland on pony-back, sometimes over mountain ranges and across rivers. A new church had just been erected at this point where I spent the first night. It required two hundred ponies to bring the lumber, and several months were consumed in the

The American Pulpit

A FRATERNAL SOUL-WINNER

A Sermon by REV. FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, D.D.
CENTRAL CHURCH, CHICAGO

TEXT -- JOHN 1: 42: "And he brought him to Jesus"

THERE is a singular grandeur and yet a singular pathos in the scene in the midst of which we behold Simon of Capernaum as the disciple of John the Baptist. It is grand to hear with responses of heart and will the solemn command, "Repent! Repent!" Nothing on earth is more sublime than a man honest with his soul when the air quivers with such a trumpet tone. It is grander still to take a step—an outward, visible, irreversible step, which puts that obedience into the form of action, and, before men, draws the line between the soul's new hope and its unsatisfactory past.

There was, as I say, a deep pathos about Simon's response to the cry "Repent," and his baptism by John. For, compared with what Simon's soul needed in order to reach his broadest, noblest manhood, these all, and alone, could accomplish so little. He needed a power which would do something positive in him and for him. To repent was only to cut himself loose from his past; it was a negative work. The same Simon-soil remained upon which other weeds could grow, if these had been uprooted. Something more than repentance must he have. He needed a force within him that should consume the annoying and dead moralities of his spirit with the flame of a resistless religiousness, an energy which would rouse every latent strength of his spirit into manifest activity. To be baptized by John for the remission of sins was only to outwardly symbolize a negative purification. He must be more than pure, if he is to remain pure; he must be powerful. Some more interior and energetic baptism than that of John must he have, if he is to reach his best manhood.

Let us not underestimate the significance of the step Simon had already taken by becoming a disciple of John. He had obtained a sense of reality which had made it impossible for him to be satisfied with the unrealities of Pharisees and Scribes, and which had prepared him for confessing any divine reality to which he might be led, and he was full of the idea of the nearness of "the Messiah." On one of these days, through which were streaming the lights of hope which John the Baptist had let into Simon's soul, his brother Andrew came to him and broke the silence with the important news, "We have found the Messias."

A Day with Jesus

Where had Andrew been to obtain such information? Not far away. We need only have our spiritual eyes open to behold the Lamb of God walking on the very pathway of life which we thoughtlessly tread. Andrew says: "We have found the Messias." Who are "we?" Why, John had been with Andrew near the Jordan. How came these commonplace men to make such a matchless discovery? Well, by being in good company. By keeping close to the best truth-teller they knew of, they discovered a better, as men always do, until they find Jesus.

John's mind had been dealing in the solitudes, and in the face of vast audiences, with the profound and passionate cries of the human soul, and with the infinite and tender response of God, its Father, to its needs. Away below every other fact which had to do with the weakness or woe of humanity, his eye saw this one only —sin. Far above all other schemes for the changing of man's sorrows into joys, and his weakness into strength, John had a dim sense of the sin-bearing love of God; and he threw into his words the whole significance of these visions and hopes, along with the eloquent meanings of a past, which Andrew and John had partially understood when he pointed to Jesus and said: "Behold the Lamb of God." The day before, John had said as this same Jesus came in sight, "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." I cannot think that these simple fishermen at all grasped the fine significance of these great words. The after-life of these who became disciples of Jesus, shows that not until after their Lord had lived his life on earth, did they have anything like a clear conception of the truth of the sin-bearing Lamb of God. It would be absurd to suppose these men to have seen in these words, the multitude of mutually exclusive ideas which differing commentators have there discovered. It was too great a saying for their thought and experience to take in. It bewildered, rather than illuminated.

Notice this, also, that while it does not seem that Andrew and John at all comprehended what the Baptist said, as Jesus came near, nor did they see that characteristic of Jesus which John the Baptizer saw when he said: "Behold, the Lamb of God!"—yet they, in their own way, got enough of the Christ-glory to be wrapped in its charm and follow on. What they talked about, how they asked questions, what Jesus said to these two men who went home with him, we would like to know full well. One thing we are sure of—he had the kind of men to deal with who are certain of finding the living kernel within every forbidding mystery. These men were not afraid to dwell with truth—"and they abode with him that day." They had a home view of Jesus; they saw truth where it is simplest and most hospitable. They came away, as all men do, with a masterful reverence and love for that kind of mysterious revelation which invites the human soul to its own home, which says to all honest and earnest souls: "Come and see."

"Behold, the Lamb of God"—with that impressive announcement in memory, these two men's minds had been listening to Jesus at home. They did not understand it. Should they lose Jesus entirely, because this idea of him was too great for them to get hold of? No! they can get enough truth concerning him to guarantee their coming sometime to the rest; they can get enough of him to make them feel for Simon, that they may draw him up within the genial radiance. We must be content to take hold of that side of divine reality which our minds may handle. Andrew tells Simon, not "We have found the Lamb of God," but, "We have found the Messias." Andrew is a soul-winner, not a great, penetrative theologian. He is narrow; and a man's narrowness often makes him intense. Andrew is a Jew; he must see the Jewish "Messias" in his "Lamb of God." He takes up the fact concerning him which fires his own heart, and which he knows will fire Simon's heart also. He does not attempt to win a soul with the Baptizer's conception of Jesus. Things are too serious with him to permit him to steal even better thunder than his own. He can do best with, because he is most interested in, his own thunderbolts of conviction and experience. Keep to your own truth, Andrew!

REV. FRANK W. GUNSAULUS, D.D.

You will get the rest in time. With what truth you have, not with what truth the Baptizer has, you must apprehend Jesus and be a soul-bringer.

Now, with our methods and habits of getting acquainted with truth and dealing with mysterious revelations; with our way of never going up to a mystery and listening, but rather lecturing about it; with our way of never following it home and staying patiently with it until daylight, but rather avoiding the effort, we are astonished that this man Andrew should ask himself just these questions: "Where is Simon, my brother! and how can I get him here?" Oh how such a brother as that puts our brotherliness to shame! Oh how such a vivid, commanding vision of Jesus as this, contrasts with our pale, vague views of Jesus, which have no power to send us to anybody, not even to our most distant relatives. Oh, how such a simple, incomplete message as this, shows us that we must have something in addition to our complex and long-drawn-out explanation of Jesus, to bring Simon to Christ. We may well stop with Andrew awhile, and study his method of bringing Simon to Jesus—for what biography of Peter would be complete without a study of this good, brotherly man, who brought the Simon-material to the Master-hand who transformed it? So, also, we may get some help for ourselves in Christian labor.

There are three stages in the process: (1) Finding. "He first findeth his own brother Simon" (verse 41). (2) Saying. "And saith unto him: 'We have found the Messias'" (verse 41). (3) Bringing. "And he brought him to Jesus" (verse 42).

I. Finding. Men have failed to observe this order. We have often been speaking to, or at our brother, before we knew where he was. Our words do not find men, when we have not found them. Men know whether our brotherliness knows where they are or not. Andrew first findeth him, before speaking at him, or about him—certainly before speaking to him.

What made Andrew such a successful finder of the soul he sought for? You say, it was his generous, intense brotherhood. That surely ought to make a man successful in finding a soul, a Simon. But it is not always so. When brotherhood has been debased and slain, the very gravitations pull the hearts asunder. It is a dreadful hour when Andrew cannot find Simon—when Andrew's haunts and loves and Simon's are far apart in reality as east from west, although the city directory says they live in the same block. It is a fact before whose presence men ought to shed tears of grateful joy that Andrew and Simon may easily and surely find each other.

A Brother's Embarrassment

Strange enough it is that men we meet can find each other so rarely, when they have to tell of Jesus. It seems hardest for those who are familiarly bound together. A brother superficially influenced by Jesus wants to hunt for somebody else's relatives. He can talk with his brother on every other topic, can warn him to avoid stormy weather, can beg him to keep out of the hot sun, can entreat him to escape the burning house and can force him to leap for his life; but when eternal destiny is to be decided and the hour is nearly gone, he is tongue-tied. He gropes in his talk. He seems blindfolded with embarrassment. He finds everybody else; he cannot find his brother. It is all but impossible for him to remember Simon—he is so happy. Oh, what a lie is all this! Wherever an Andrew really and deeply finds Jesus, as Christ, he first of all things after that findeth his own brother Simon. It is a superficial Christian experience which forgets the tenderest ties and the nearest heart-companions, and contents itself for the first month in hiring a sixth-story room and mailing tracts, or singing about the New Jerusalem. If you do not feel that you must tell somebody about Christ, it is because you have not much to tell.

I suppose Andrew was simple and old-fashioned enough to go where Simon could be found. We are too fashionable, or too decorous, or too churchly, or too cold-hearted and unchristian to do that. We establish ourselves within a great building of solemn look and dignified architecture, with pews numbered, and most of them for rent, with a theological test for every visitor who would remain, which we do not ourselves understand or profess to enforce—a sweet-voiced choir the while singing at us and for us the worship of God whose words we cannot catch, but whose phrasing and tones we admire, and having established our place of business, with such completeness and care, we say to our brother Simon, who does not know Jesus at all, "Now, you come in here and believe." I know this is a very bold way of stating it, but I meant you should see the dreadful contrast between the way in which Andrew finds Simon, and the way in which we do not find Simon, our brother. To find Simon, Andrew goes where he is; we too often tell him by advertisements in the paper to come to us, and get acquainted with us and our Lord if he is able. Our brotherliness is a very unfraternal affair. Oh Christ! speak to us so that we may want Simon; speak to us of such good things that we may not keep them as luxuries in our church establishment; speak to us, so that we shall see our brother Simon glow with a meaning and his life flash with a significance, such as will urge us to hunt for him until we find him.

Persistent Search

We must go where men are, touch them where they are, seek them for what they are, if we are to be soul-winners like Andrew. Andrew's Christian enthusiasm would have carried him over danger, through deep darkness, past vile places, across seas of disgusting infamy, up any height of difficulty, down into any depth of disgrace, if by any or all, he might have found Simon. Any man who finds the real Christ will, yea must find his brother. After he sees Jesus, he has new eyes for souls. No den of infamy is too horrible for his pious feet, if away there at the end of his path of duty, sparkles the gem of a soul. No distance, leading through by-ways of shame and up rough rocks of forbidding sharpness is too long or too severe, if such a soul knows that there is a human being who needs Christ at the end. The church must go where men are; it must find them, if it is to be Christian.

II. Saying.—Andrew findeth and then Andrew sayeth: many a man and many an institution have found men and they have not been brought to Jesus.

Simon has remained the same Simon, without an intimation of ever being transformed into a Peter. Men are so ready to hear, so anxious for a tone of hope, so hungry for a crumb of inspiration, that it is not hard to find them if one wants to do them ever so little good. Every man has confessed by the earnestness with which any tiny ray of sunlight is caught up, that he is a plant whose nature pleads for the sun. Every soul is a prophet of the Christ. I care not what splendid names you put upon your societies, your clubs, your institutions and your churches, for that matter, if they do not somehow say to the souls who are attracted to them, "We have found the Messias," each of them is an Andrew who has found Simon, but who might as well be dumb. Simon very soon grows tired of such a mute brother, especially if he knows that he has made much of a pretense about finding him.

What Shall You Say?

What shall you say? If you ask that question, there is very little need of your saying anything. If there is anything but one thing which you can say, as you look at him, be silent. It will not touch him. You will feel like a dead man as you mumble it out. You have not been with Christ at his home. There was one thing, and one only, which Andrew might say: "We have found the Messias." How much more grandly one brother man can talk to another than that in heaven I do not know; one thing is sure, there never was loftier saying on earth than that, "We have found the Messias."

Notice, if you would be not only a soul-finder, but also a soul-bringer, that what the plain-minded and successful Andrew said, required no greater genius to utter than the weakest here possesses; for it was the shortest yet the clearest possible statement of a fact: "We have found the Messias." The whole of Christianity is fact. Jesus himself had made Andrew factual rather than speculative, when he said to him, just yesterday, at the very moment when he began to ask questions: "Come and see." In that atmosphere of fact, with the power of a fact behind him and in his voice, he went out to hunt up Simon. A speculation or a theory about this man Jesus would have kept him indoors. It would have driven him upstairs, beyond the reach of human voices and needs, where it has imprisoned many a conceited Andrew until Simon's funeral had to be attended to. "We have found the Messias. Simon, my brother, I have a fact for you."

Simon would have given no such response to anything but such a statement. He would probably have worsted Andrew in an argument. But Andrew had the advantage in that alone he had the fact. O, Andrew! never surrender that advantage when you go out to bring Simon. Never drop the weapon of your fact, to argue with your bird on the wing, but fire! Scepticism is like a bright lawyer with a poor case; it is better on argument than on facts. Evangelism true and thorough is not a debater, but a witness; it does not argue, it testifies. Our vision of Jesus is not like Andrew's; we do not see him at home; we do not take the trouble of going with truth as far as truth will take us, and getting acquainted with it, we do not abide with Jesus. We want to be saved from hell: we want the benefits, the earthly and heavenly perquisites of Christianity; but we do not want to know too much. We do not want to know enough to compel us to give up our fiddling business if it pays. We do not want to get absorbed in the Christ. We, therefore, never go far enough with him to get into the best and divinest parts of his grace. We get just enough Christianity to make us ashamed that we have not more; and it is no wonder that we get embarrassed, and fall to talking about ourselves and the minor and incidental joys of having found Jesus, instead of about the Messiah himself.

He sayeth: "We have found the Messias." Finding the Messias was first in order; then finding Simon. Mark the personal element in this history—in all Christian endeavor. Here is a person, who is speaking to a person, in order to lead him to a person. Andrew, Simon, Jesus—three persons and no abstractions. It is the Christ in our Christianity with which our own personal Christianity and personal helpfulness to others must begin and end. When we get to dealing with the impersonal and the abstract, it is because we have lost the personal Messias, have no sense of our own personalness, and have no interest in the personal Simon. Abstractions are sometimes but ghosts which indicate how many living Simons have been buried without a personal salvation.

And a man does not always see the whole Christ. He sees the side of Messias next to him. This thought of Messias – how it thrilled that patriot few. That was the small end of

The True Idea of the Christ of God

of course. It was the end Andrew got hold of; it was the end which he knew Simon could get hold of. Would that our preaching of Christ could touch the sentiment of world-wide patriotism. With Andrew and Simon, the fortunes of Israel were dear above all else; and the enemies which they desired to dethrone were Rome and the political methods which made them a race of slaves. Andrew and Simon's Messias is a political deliverer; so also is the Messias which the soul of the broadest man craves, a Saviour of humanity — that greater Israel—from all its dangers.

The Messias which Andrew saw was vastly greater than his conception of him. He had come to deliver men from sin, to bind them to the on-marching righteousness of God, and, in that way, to conquer all the Romes which might seek to oppress them. Every hope of man to-day runs forth to greet the preacher of this Christ. Besides this great hope at the heart of progress, every genuine feeling of the dreadful presence of sin, every desire to be rid of it; every noble movement of the unquenched good beneath the oppressive evil of life and every glimmer of desire to perpetuate it; every wandering dream of sometimes being true, amidst so many evidences of now being untrue, and every desire that that dream may be realized—all the man there is left rushes out to meet the evangelist of a real Messias. Go to thy brother. "He will not respect me," you say? No. It may be so; but he will respect the Christ you have; and not you but Christ must save him.

H. Bringing. The "finding" and the "seeing" of Andrew would have been altogether useless, however interesting they might have been, if they had not brought us the result of "bringing" Simon to Jesus. It would, I admit, have been altogether unwise to have pronounced Andrew's piety and Christianity complete if he could find immediate success in finding and bringing Simon. Simon might have been one of many others who might have refused deliberately as Judas; these would but have made Andrew a disheartened or reckless soul-winner. God has something to do with the "bringing," so also has the will upon which seed is sown. The one ought to be remembered by every humble and prayerful worker who looks to him for his "harvest." But the fact that he was a searcher for human souls, with Christ's spirit and a brother's love in his every soul, and the fact that when he found him he said to him the words which were sorest to ring in Simon's ears before and Christ's most certain blessings which should realize those hopes—these facts were in making the bringing of Simon unto Jesus sure. Let us leave it to God, but let us not be hasty to say, or even reverently to say, "Thy will be done." Let us not put either our wills, our bigotry, or our indolence in God's way before we pray that prayer.

We have thus learned to know Andrew as the soul-finder, the soul-informer, the soul-bringer. In the presence of a Jesus, who had just come from the awful temptation in the wilderness, he could be no other than the Christ's missionary. In the presence of Simon Peter, whom he brought to Jesus, and Jesus himself, whose light discovers the value of souls, how great Andrew seems. He is great, because he did a great thing. Without empire, he annexed an empire to the kingdom of the King of kings. Without genius, he has influenced the world of history as no man who has genius alone has done. What a different world this is, what different pages are in its history, what a different future lies before it because Andrew brought him to Jesus. Andrew's hand is beneath the structure of our Christian civilization as is that of none of Israel's tyrants. He utters his voice through the trumpet notes of Simon Peter, and sends his influence along the larger movements of that impetuous, noble life. What a crisis it was in his own religious career, when he waited to take the first step toward his own brother Simon in the name of Jesus! His going to him at once settled his own place in history and to glory, and gave a new turn and stronger impulse to the stream of goodness and truth. The poor Methodist preacher whom Charles H. Spurgeon heard one night was as inferior soul to all but Jesus and history and humanity for whom he found this imperial man. The poorer monk of the mountain country, whose words roused Savonarola to become a Protestant out of season and a Republican before the time, had the same sort of real greatness. O, ye who start out to be the Andrews of the church and of the nation, know ye that the power to bring a greater soul unto the truth is a testimonial of the godlikeness of man.

A LEPER FESTIVAL IN DUTCH GUIANA

FROM the leper colony of Bethesda, at Paramaribo, in Surinam, Dutch Guiana, comes a letter of grateful thanks to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the accompanying photograph, taken expressly for this journal. Mr. and Mrs. Weiss have arrived safely at the settlement, after their year's sojourn in the United States. Last July, an article describing their work and the object of their visit to this country, was published in these columns, which, as Mr. Weiss thankfully acknowledges, introduced them to Christian friends in many States and led to substantial help in their work. The good-will did not end with their departure, for Mr. Weiss says that one of the first letters he received after his arrival home was one from the proprietor of this journal, inclosing a check for gifts from our readers, which had been sent to this office for the benefit of the lepers.

The return of the two devoted Moravian missionaries was celebrated with genuine enthusiasm in the settlement. The day of the steamer's arrival had been long anticipated. The lepers had erected home-decorations on the bank of the river, and had obtained from friends in the town the loan of some flags to add to the splendor of the ovation. The whole population came to the landing when the steamer was sighted, to give local expression to the joy with which they welcomed their devoted friends. The poor sufferers forgot, for that day at least, their misery, in the pleasure of reunion. They had written often to their two friends while they were traveling in this country, and Mr. and Mrs. Weiss had sent regular letters to them, but the joy of seeing them once more in the flesh overcame many of them, and was manifested by all. Two of the sufferers had succumbed to the disease during the missionaries' absence, but three new patients had been received. Unhappily, there is never any lack of candidates for admission, for new victims are being continually added to the long list of sufferers from the disease. If Mr. Weiss had the means to erect cottages on the land appropriated to his work, they would be filled as soon as they were ready for occupancy. The care and sympathy and kindness bestowed on the poor afflicted creatures by the missionaries, and the deaconesses who are their helpers, are widely known, and it is the eagerly sought privilege of new victims to secure admission to the settlement.

The Dutch settlers at Paramaribo fully appreciate the services these devoted Moravian workers are rendering, and they claimed the privilege of joining in the welcome of their return. They sent to the settlement the materials for an excellent dinner for all the lepers, at which Mr. and Mrs. Weiss were personally welcomed. The first letter ever received at the settlement was read at the repast, and made the address of welcome. One of the most pathetic features of the entertainment was the disinclination among the child lepers of little parents from the missionaries had brought from the United States. Every one had been remembered, and their hearts and minds were heightened by the thought.

We are glad to know that this is neither to be the last time Mrs. Weiss has entertained the disease. We shall pray that God may long preserve them from the infection, that they may live to feed many more of those unhappy outcasts made in the Saviour.

Mrs. Booth-Tucker Passes Away

Her Last Words Were a Prayer

The Salvation Army's Great Sorrow

IN the prime of a glorious career of Christian usefulness, Mrs. Emma Booth-Tucker, Consul and joint head of the Salvation Army in the United States, was suddenly called from mortal life to the life everlasting, on October 29. She was traveling on a train of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad, from Kansas City eastward, to join her husband at Chicago, when the train plunged into an open switch near Dean Lake, Mo., while running at the rate of forty-five miles an hour. As the train left the rails, one of the cars crashed into a steel water-tank with a force so terrific that the great tank, with its weight of water, was moved five feet from its foundations. Sleeping-cars and day-coaches were instantly piled upon each other in the darkness, in a confused mass. Passengers were hurled from their berths, pinioned under the debris, and bruised and mangled by the broken timbers.

On the train with Mrs. Booth-Tucker, and in the same car, was Col. Thomas Holland, superintendent of the Salvation Army Colony at Amity, Col., which place the Consul had visited only a few days before. Both were made senseless by the shock, and lay bleeding and unconscious in the ruins of the demolished tourist car, of which they were the only occupants.

Some of the passengers in other coaches, who had escaped injury, quickly formed a relief party, and with the aid of the people of Dean Lake, began the work of rescue. Many were extricated from the wreck before the rescuers found Mrs. Booth-Tucker, who had been thrown from her berth, and lay terribly crushed under a section of the side of the car. Chopping away the timbers with axes, the rescuers tenderly bore their unconscious burden to the little station, where some kind-hearted women passengers did what they could for her. It was soon apparent, however, that she was beyond human aid. Her skull was fractured, and she had received internal injuries. Col. Holland was found to have sustained very serious injuries. Twenty-six other passengers on the ill-fated train were more or less dangerously hurt, two probably mortally.

Two relief trains soon arrived on the scene—one from Kansas City, the other from Marcelline—both with surgeons on board. All the injured were placed on the Marcelline train, which had only proceeded a few miles when a truck slipped from one of the cars, and the passengers were severely shaken up. A few moments after the train stopped, Mrs. Booth-Tucker died, passing away within two hours after she had received her injuries.

Miss Helen Dammes, Private Secretary of Mrs. Booth-Tucker, who accompanied the party on the train, gives this account of the accident and of the Consul's last moments:

Colonel Holland succeeded in securing Pullman berths, and all of our party had changed to the sleepers except Mrs. Booth-Tucker and Colonel Holland, who remained seated in the tourist car, deep in a discussion of the plans for the Amity Colony. I had left them about a minute, I think, when the terrific crash came. After the first great deafening noise, the cars went plunging and swaying, and finally brought up with another awful crash. This was because of their being thrown against the huge water tank. The horror of the situation at first came from the utter darkness into which the cars were plunged, and then from the moans and cries that arose from the maimed and wounded. I was thrown violently upon my face in the aisle of the car, but on recovering my senses and arising, I found that I was not hurt.

I made my way out of the car. Many berth sections had been smashed and the floor was littered with bedding and splinters, with the injured lying in the debris. I heard their cries of anguish. My immediate companions were safe, but I saw, to my horror, that the tourist car in which Mrs. Booth-Tucker and Colonel Holland had been, was reduced to a smashed and broken thing. A dozen men were wielding axes on it, working to save human life. At last the unconscious form of Mrs. Booth-Tucker was lifted out of the mass of debris. We followed as it was borne to the little Dean Lake station. There two mattresses were brought. Colonel Holland was laid upon one, the Consul upon the other. I took my place by her side. Dr. Hunter, of Pittsburg, Kan., gave her medical attention, but it was unavailing. Her skull had been fractured and her body had been otherwise most cruelly tortured in the wreck. Wondrously enough, she recovered consciousness. I bent closely to her, and it seemed that her eyes recognized me.

"My husband—my children." I heard her whisper, and then her lips moved. She was praying. She took splendid courage to pray then. The doctor told me that the pure, good woman was suffering terrible agony. But she tightened her lips and only moaned a little. Mercifully, insensibility came and ended further suffering. For an hour I watched her half-perceptible breathing. It was about midnight when she died, and I crossed the slender hands upon her breast.

THE LATE MRS. EMMA BOOTH-TUCKER
CONSUL OF THE SALVATION ARMY IN THE UNITED STATES

MR. AND MRS. BOOTH-TUCKER AND THEIR FAMILY

Mrs. Emma Moss Booth-Tucker, or the Consul, as she was universally called by the members of the Salvation Army, was one of the most remarkable women who has been identified with religious work in the last quarter of a century. Her life story reads like a romance, but it is a romance that carries with it a splendid lesson of inspiration and high spiritual achievement. She was the second daughter of General William Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army, and Catherine Mumford, his wife, and she inherited in a large degree the remarkable energy and intensely spiritual nature of both parents. While still a mere girl, in short skirts and with her hair in braids, she began her work of love for the unsaved. Many touching stories are told of her labors among the children of the poor and wretched in London. Hardly more than a child herself she established, and successfully maintained, a home for the orphan children of Salvation Army officers; she led numerous crusades against the evil life of the British metropolis, and on the platform, the slim lithe, great-eyed, earnest girl, thrilled the hearts of listening audiences and was made instrumental in leading many to repentance and salvation.

As she grew to womanhood, she looked about for still wider fields of usefulness. As one of the younger officers of the Salvation Army, she had the oversight of the young men and women who came for training to the International Training Home in London, and hundreds of those who were then sent out to the field are now doing excellent work in different parts of the world.

In 1887 she married Frederick St. George de Latour Tucker, who was then engaged in the Salvation Army work in India, occupying a prominent position. After their marriage, the husband assumed the name of Booth-Tucker, and together they took charge of the Army's work in India. One who knew and loved Mrs. Booth-Tucker, has written the following tribute to the work of this noble Christian woman:

THE ARMY HEADQUARTERS, NEW YORK

"With bare, often with bleeding feet, Consul Booth-Tucker has many a time walked the blistering sands and rocky ways of India. As Commissioner Raheeman (Mercy), she speedily became widely loved among the dark-skinned people amid whom she labored; and she inaugurated and conducted, with her husband, a spiritual and philanthropic work among the bitterly poor, sorrowful and downtrodden of the provinces, that has made her name a household word to this day."

In 1896, she came to the United States with her husband, since which time they have been jointly the central figures and leaders in all the American work of the Salvation Army. Commander and Consul, they have labored together loyally and successfully, and have built up the Army to the standard of a great national religious organization, with vast resources, and a far-reaching capacity for doing good. Mrs. Booth-Tucker was prominent, if not indeed foremost, in every new departure in the Army work; in the Rescue work; the Children's Homes; the Industrial Homes, the Colonies, and in a multitude of ways and means that were devised for aiding the poor and the fallen, and reclaiming the erring. Her magnetic and dramatic eloquence on the platform, her charm of manner and conversation socially, and her intense earnestness and high spiritual enthusiasm, made her

MISSIONARY PIKE PREACHING THE GOSPEL TO THE WORSHIPERS OF JUGGERNAUT

AT THE GREAT JUGGERNAUT FESTIVAL

The Extraordinary Spectacle this Year Described by an Eye-witness — The Decline of Idolatry in India

ON the coast of the beautiful Bay of Bengal, in the holy land of Orissa, lies the holiest of all holy cities of India, Puri, the abode of Juggernaut (or Jagganath), the "prince or lord of the world. Behind an ideal beach of pure white sand, gradually arises the lovely city, lying among waving palms and trees of dark green, glossy verdure. "Distance lends enchantment to the view." Overtopping all is the cone-shaped temple of India's popular god.

Annually the idol receives a bath, gets sick, so it is said, after two weeks recovers, and is then taken in state to his sylvan home, about one and one-half miles from the temple. His brother and sister accompany him on separate cars. Three new cars, about thirty-five feet square and fifty feet high, are built to carry the idols. Juggernaut rides in state in the largest car, having sixteen wheels, and his brother Bala-Rama (or Bala-Badhra) and his sister Subadhra, in the other two cars, each car having fourteen wheels; three ropes, five inches in diameter, are attached to each car. One of these ropes can be seen on the photograph I send. A strong police guard prevents any accidents or acts of self-immolation. Men and women roll on the ground behind the car, and kiss the dust, intoxicated with frenzy. All three cars are pulled by the thousands of pilgrims to the summer residence.

At times, two hundred thousand pilgrims are said to come to this festival, and ten thousand a year have died of cholera; but still this does not deter the crowds from coming, for whoever dies there (so the priests say), or within a radius of ten miles from the temple, is sure of heaven. To show how inconsistent the people are in their heathen faith, it is only necessary to state that about four or five miles from the temple is a place the Hindus call "the gate of hell."

This year, in spite of cheap travel by railway and the best of protection for life and property, there were only 50,000 pilgrims in Puri. The priests are sad, and so are the boarding-house keepers. As high as 200,000 people formerly came, it is said, and 150,000 were expected this year. This large falling off in the number of worshipers proves that idolatry is waning, and that India is joining the ranks of those who "hail the power of Jesus' name."

On the day of Juggernaut's alleged recovery from fever, the gates are opened to let the pilgrims in to see their god. Many thousands throng before the gates, and if there were not a very strong police guard at the gates many would be trampled to death. The police have split rattans, with which they hit the heads and shoulders of those pushing forward, and thus drive them back. The pilgrims are admitted in batches of about fifty. A mere glimpse of Juggernaut gives one forgiveness of all sins—so the people believe—hence the pilgrims push and perspire to get a glimpse of the idol.

It is hard to find a more putrid pond of water anywhere than the one in which the pilgrims of Juggernaut bathe. Government has forbidden the people taking this water home, but cannot prevent the bathing. Formerly the great outbreaks of cholera, by which thousands perished in Puri annually, were principally caused by the weak, weary pilgrims drinking the filthy water, full of cholera germs. Sanitation, and the quick and easy travel by railroads, has improved the health of all. Comparatively few pilgrims now fall victims of cholera.

Of all the hideous idols of India, Juggernaut is the most hideous. His features are distorted, and he is a poor caricature of a man; yet the worshipers, especially poor widows, are willing to pay large sums to get a glimpse of the idol.

From all parts of India princes and princesses and the nobility, as well as the meanest beggars such as lepers, the halt and lame and blind, also thieves and thugs, throng to see and do homage to their lord. It is sad to see the many, many women, most of them widows, who come here.

In the most prominent corner of Puri, where all the pilgrims must pass, Rev. J. G. Pike, a veteran missionary of the English Baptist Mission, has built a Gospel lighthouse. There a band of preachers and the missionaries, from dawn to dark, extend to all the invitation of Jesus, the only Lord of the world: "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest." This invitation falls on thousands of deaf ears; but here and there one comes to Jesus and is saved.

Mr. Pike secured, after some years of waiting, a site from the municipality, on which he was permitted to erect a Bible and Book Room. The site is at the corner of the old pilgrim road and the broad road to Juggernaut's summer residence. All pilgrims to Puri have to pass that book room, and unless they wilfully shut their ears they must hear the Gospel preachers. Juggernaut's worshipers have stopped at the book room while pulling the car, and have caused the Christians because there were so few of them and so many thousands of pilgrims. Everything in India is changing. Jesus is being enthroned and Juggernaut dethroned. A Christian policeman, whose duty called him to keep order in Juggernaut Puri said to me: "I have been in the temple three times. All I can say is that after you pass the Lion's Gate you are in hell."

Yes, in there is hell! One of our converts, however, became a Christian even in that hell. In order to find out whether Juggernaut could help or not, he went back of the idol and prayed: "Juggernaut, if you are alive, kill me, kill me!" Then taking a dagger he stabbed it three times into the Juggernaut, but the idol did not move. That convinced the man that all was a fraud. He came to Jesus and found him a Saviour indeed.

Three Christian Heroines

IT is a remarkable coincidence that in the space of one short month, the world should have been bereft of three women, each of whom in her respective sphere, was a source of blessing to multitudes. Mrs. Moody had, throughout a long life, unostentatiously, but very effectively, contributed to the harmonious working of the many projects of usefulnes, initiated by her energetic and devoted husband. Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon, in spite of her ill-health and personal suffering, had given thought and effort to the needs of impoverished workers, to the comfort and welfare of the widows and the orphans; and Mrs. Booth-Tucker, whose tragic death has only just occurred, was in the full tide of her beneficent work, not only proclaiming the Gospel herself, but taking a prominent part in the direction of a host of laborers in Christian work, and superintending the management of numerous enterprises for the relief of suffering and poverty. All three have gone to their reward, and have entered into the presence of Him whom they served so faithfully on earth. The world is the poorer for their going, but for them, how blessed must have been the greeting, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of the Lord!"

Lives such as these three women lived, are an inspiration and a stimulus to others. "I am only a woman," some say, "What can I do?" To all such, the message of such lives is that which Martha brought to Mary: "The Master is come and calleth for thee." Jesus has work to be done in the world, that no hands can do so well as the tender, sympathetic hands of a woman. No voice so comforting, so cheering as hers, no ministry so sweet, so consolatory, so encouraging as that she can tender. Mr. Spurgeon often said, that, when worn out with physical pain, oppressed with burdens that lay very heavy on his shoulders, and depressed by sorrows and disappointments, he had only to visit the room in which his suffering wife was so patiently and cheerfully living her stricken life, to get new courage and stronger faith. If she had done no more than to help such a man to renewed effort, she would have done much, but, all over the country, ministers and Christian workers were sharing in the loving helpfulness and practical sympathy which emanated from that abode of pain and physical weariness. So it was with Mrs. Moody. Those nearest to her—her husband and children—knew how blessed it was to be in the companionship of one who was in such close touch with the infinite perfection of her Lord. But others in ever-widening circles were benefited, too, and the power and tenderness that she gained from on high, were passed on to them. Of Mrs. Booth-Tucker, too, so different in the character of her work, how many would give similar testimony. Her husband—may the Great Consoler, who alone can be his support in this hour of crushing bereavement, comfort and sustain him—found in her the best adviser, the most cheerful helper, and most loyal comrade in his exhausting work. What, too, must have been the effect of her influence on the men and women in distant cities who are preaching Christ to the poor and the degraded and the lost! They could never tell. It was beyond words.

We grieve over the loss of such women. Fain would we have kept them in this hard, pitiless world, where their loving, tender, compassionate spirit is so sadly needed. Their lives were a benediction and an inspiration. But God knows best. If we were not sure of that, life would be dark indeed. Let us thank Him that such women have lived, and that he has given us the privilege of seeing how his indwelling presence in them can make humanity so heavenly.

Feet in the Net

YOU have not gone far in life if you have not discovered that the way is full of nets into which our unwary, or perhaps our helpless, feet, sometimes, somehow, get thrust and tangled; nets of disappointment, or difficult circumstances, or failing health, or narrowing income, or loss of heart to cope with daily uncongenial duty, or innocent companionship changed to debasing thralldom, or some other hard or perilous condition, when one feels precisely as one does when his foot is caught, and it seems beyond his strength to pull it out.

One day at a railway station, where there were many interlacing tracks, a foreman stood directing some needed repairs to the rails. A long backing train approached, and he turned with his men to clear the way, when his heel was caught by a defective switch or frog, and held him fast as in a vice. With all the might of desperation he struggled to escape. His friends seized him and put forth their united strength to drag him away, or to break the terrible grip of the iron. All in vain. Every effort was made to stop the train; but though the speed was checked the deadly wheels rolled slowly on, and there for one awful moment the helpless victim stood, with his agonized gaze fixed upon the creeping monster, until it touched him, bore him down, went grinding over him, and left him a mangled corpse.

How many nets for spiritual feet all about this world are just as unsuspected, just as powerful, and just as deadly as those jaws of steel that gripped that poor man to his death!

God be thanked for this note of faith and courage, a note for all time and for every soul ensnared: "Mine eyes are ever toward the Lord, for he shall pluck my feet from out the net."

Early Rising

EARLY rising is undoubtedly a virtue, but it is not the only virtue in the calendar. Millions of people have to rise early, irrespective of their like or dislike in the case. They are summoned by the relentless call of the day's work. Other people, who rise early because it is their preference, because they cannot sleep after a certain hour, often glorify this admirable habit of theirs as if it were in itself a patent of saintliness; and, not stopping here, they proceed to insist that everyone else shall imitate their example. They rap and call, and cease not their rapping and calling, till others in the family, who long for a morning drowse and the last luxurious nap that is the crown of the night's rest, are compelled to shake off their sleepiness and rise unwillingly. Old people seem to require less sleep than younger ones. If they do waken early, why should they not read their Bibles in the tranquil silence of the new day and let others in the house sleep on? Invalids and young folk should not be hurried in the morning.

Children, whenever it is at all possible, should be allowed to sleep until they wake. Breakfast, unless it is all important to have it finished and put aside, should be a movable feast, not placed on the table according to a hard and fast rule. Early rising should not be a fetich. It should simply be accepted as an obvious necessity for some people.

Intimacy With God.

NO one can read the Old Testament without receiving a new and deep impression of the familiarity with which the old Patriarchs and Prophets approached Jehovah. To them He was a silent partner in all their affairs; the Father whom they never hesitated to take into confidence about little things; the God whom they importuned, with reiterated and vehement earnestness, about the things which pressed upon their hearts. God was not to Abraham, or Jacob, or Joseph, or David, an abstraction. He was a real Person, who took an interest in what they were planning and doing, to whom they turned when most sorrowful for sin, sure that He would pardon them; with whom they pleaded that their friends might be forgiven, and who, in short, had something to do with their entire daily life.

The great loss and trouble of our life of to-day is that we keep God at a distance. He is indeed practically not much in the thoughts of many men and women. They arrange the details in their homes, their business and their life without reference to the Divine Being in whose hand are the issues of their life and breath, and who at any moment can put an arrest on these activities and call us to go to another world. It would seem as if the thing most to be desired by Christians of to-day were a child-like confidence in, and a friendly intimacy with our Father, who is revealed to us now, as He was in the old days, in the person of His Son.

EVERY home should own an up-to-date encyclopedia. Hardly a day passes but some subject, some town, or some person is mentioned, that requires "looking up." Wives and husbands ask each other questions, and children ask parents questions, which cannot be intelligently answered offhand. At such times an encyclopedia must be consulted, and it must be up-to-date to give satisfaction. We live in a wide-awake age; conditions change quickly, and only 20th Century Information can meet 20th Century Requirements.

About five years ago, Queen Victoria, Gladstone, Salisbury, Bismarck, McKinley, and Pope Leo were prominently in the public eye—to-day they have all passed from the scene, and others have come to the front. Twenty years ago the Telephone and Electric Light were in their infancy; the X-ray, Trolley, Automobile, Acetylene, Color Photography, and Wireless Telegraphy had not been heard of; while the Cuban War, the Boer War, Boxers, Dowieism, the Panama Canal Purchase, the Hague Tribunal and the Alaska Boundary Decision, were nearly all unknown even a few years ago: yet who to-day can claim to be reasonably well-informed without an intelligent acquaintance with these important phases in national and international development?

The Crown Encyclopedia supplies all this information in compact form, and it is the only really up-to-date work of its kind. War Clouds in the East

WAR between Russia and Japan still continues, unhappily, among the possibilities of the near future. The two principals are evidently fully alive to the fact, for, while professing an earnest desire for peace, both are straining every nerve to bring on the scene of probable conflict every ship and soldier that can be spared. Japan is naturally incensed, as are the European Powers, at the announcement by Russia, that the evacuation of Manchuria, to which she had pledged herself, has been indefinitely postponed. Russia makes the excuse that China is not yet prepared to take control of the province, and besides, has failed to give the pledges insuring Russia's preponderating influence that Russia demands. Mere pretexts for remaining in possession are, of course, easily found, and as a matter of fact, no one who is familiar with Russian policy expects that she will ever let go her hold on the province. Japan, while resenting this spoliation of China, would probably bear it with equanimity, were it not that Russia is using her position in Manchuria as a menace to Korea, where Japanese influence is paramount. Her armies are concentrated on the Manchurian side of the frontier of Korea, and a report is in circulation that she has seized a Korean port and is fortifying it, and mounting heavy guns. That Russia would like to absorb Korea is no secret. It is a helpless little kingdom, which might easily be conquered; but if it is to lose its independence, Japan considers herself the natural heir, and has given an unequivocal intimation to Russia that she is prepared to fight for it. The courage of Japan in threatening war with Russia cannot be doubted, but Japan is quite aware how terrible such a conflict would be, and naturally shrinks from it. Great Britain, also, who is now Japan's ally, is using all her influence to prevent the outbreak of hostilities. Negotiations are being conducted between the Japanese Commander, the Marquis Ito, and Admiral Alexieff, the Russian Viceroy, which it is hoped may satisfy Japan that no Russian aggression on Korea is contemplated; but all is in readiness on both sides for the conflict should it occur. The Japanese fleet is cruising in Korean waters, and the huge Russian warships are assembled at Port Arthur, within easy reach of Seoul, the Korean capital. One of the newspaper correspondents declares that Korea at the present time resembles a straw house, into which people are allowed to carry lighted candles. It is easy to see, therefore, how slight an act of imprudence on either side may bring about a conflagration. It may be hoped, however, that in gaining so huge an accession of territory as Manchuria, Russia will rest content for the time, and not precipitate a conflict with Japan by seizing the little country of Korea. The danger arises, as the Bible warns us that it would in all cases, from greed and rapacity:

From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts? Ye lust and have not: ye kill and desire to have (James 4: 1, 2).

An Ancient Clue

A cable message from London to the American press says, "Never, perhaps, has a modern expedition had in it more of the elements of romance than one which left London recently for Egypt under the auspices of a well-known firm of mining engineers. These twentieth century pleasure seekers are acting on information obtained from papyri in the British Museum written 4,000 years B. C. They are going to search for gold and precious stones in the western oasis of the Libyan Desert, a practically unexplored region of over 40,000 square miles, which was called by ancient writers the Valley of the Kings, and which is said to contain much evidence of workings for gold and precious stones. The secular press dwells on the curious significance of the clue to the riches of the region having been given nearly six thousand years ago. That it has not been followed before is due to the fact that the papyri had not been deciphered. Now that the clue has been given, no time is being lost in following it. If men were as eager to obtain spiritual riches, they would not neglect the direction, which also came down from ancient times.

Thou shalt remember the Lord thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth (Deut. 8: 18).

Out of Prison After 29 Years

A man, confused and embarrassed by the busy life of the city, came to New York last week. He had that day received his pardon from Governor Odell, after being in prison twenty-nine years. He was thirty-three years of age when, in a fit of ungovernable rage, he killed a man, and was sentenced to imprisonment for life. Account was taken of the provocation he received, and that probably saved him from being executed. During his imprisonment he has behaved in an exemplary manner, but he never expected to be released, and was astonished when his pardon was granted. A Roman Catholic clergyman, who had known him before the crime, and was aware how utterly friendless he was, had an opportunity of interceding with the Governor for him and took advantage of it. His long incarceration, his good behavior, and his old age were considered, and he was released. As he did not expect a pardon, he had taken no interest in events outside his prison, so that when he was free, the changes which had taken place amazed him. He was bewildered with the rush and hurry of the streets after being so long in seclusion. He grasped the arm of his friend, and looked this way and that, in dread of being run over, and begged to be taken into some quiet place till he could recover his nerve. "Most of my life is gone," he said to one who talked with him, "but I shall get work, and make the best of the time that is left to me." It is the best resolve open to him. No one can give him back the years he has lost. It is so that sin robs the life, even when the sinner escapes prison. He has reason to be thankful for even a late conversion, but he can never cease to grieve over the years lost beyond recall. Only in the promise of God of heavenly restoration has he hope.

I will restore to you the years that the locust hath eaten (Joel 2: 25).

An Anarchist Arrested

The anarchist groups in this country were stricken with consternation last week, when a guest from England was arrested at a public meeting in New York. He is said to be the most conspicuous anarchist in England, and his coming to this country to lecture had been anticipated with intense interest. He had just concluded his first speech at a meeting held in his honor, when an Inspector of Immigration called him to the side of the platform and told him that he must return to Ellis Island, where an order for his deportation was awaiting him. The order came from Secretary Cortelyou in Washington, and was peremptory. The authorities in New York were eager to give bail for him, and to employ the best lawyers to defend him, but they were informed that there would be no trial, and that he would simply be sent back to his own country as an undesirable immigrant. The friends of his friends claimed the protection of the law, and insisted that having committed no offense, his detention was an illegal outrage. They were told, however, that as an alien he was not entitled to the protection of our laws, and as he has avowed

In denouncing all law, he probably forgot that he might have occasion to appeal to the law.

As many as have sinned without law shall perish without law (Rom. 2: 12).

TRIBUTES TO A MOTHER IN ISRAEL

Memorial Services in Honor of the Late Mrs. D. L. Moody

THOUGH a heavy rain was falling, a goodly-sized audience gathered in the Chicago Avenue Church, Chicago, on October 14, to do honor to the memory of the loved and lamented wife of the late Dwight L. Moody. The pastor, Rev. Mr. Jacoby, presided. The Moody Institute Quartette sang several appropriate selections. Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Brooklyn, assisted in the services.

Among the speakers was the Hon. John B. Farwell, who referred to Mrs. Moody's early life when she and her husband lived on opposite sides of the same street, and attended the same schools, where they first met. Mr. Farwell thought that not only had Mr. Moody had a transfiguration scene which forever charmed him with "Jesus Only," but that Mrs. Moody had also, or neither one would have spared the other to so often go apart, and be far separated. While Mr. Moody was first in Europe, he made two discoveries. One was a young girl, to whose devout prayers he was an answer, when he went to preach in her home church. The second was when, one night, he felt that his sermon had been a terrible failure, and he wanted to hide in humiliation. But when he asked sinners to come to the altar, five hundred rose. He thought he was misunderstood, and that they had risen in a body for some other reason. But more rose to his second invitation than to the first. Thus his faith was strengthened in the power of God through the weakness of human flesh.

Among those sent to Mr. Moody in England, continued Mr. Farwell, to help him, was a Manchester thief; but one who knew the Bible and loved it. Mr. Moody said he was only too willing to learn about the Bible from anyone, even from a thief. When Mr. Moody sailed for America, the converted thief took the next steamer, and presented himself before the evangelist in Chicago. The dilemma as to what to do with him was solved by Mrs. Moody. "Let him preach," she said, "we will see what is in him." His text was John 3:16. For seven nights thereafter, he preached each night a different sermon from the same text, to the glory of God.

Mr. Morton, an old friend of Mr. Moody's, said that before Moody was a public man, he was filled with the missionary spirit. He was simply a city missionary. Mrs. Moody was better educated than her husband, and it was well known that she was of very great assistance to him, and revised very many of his manuscripts. She was known to be a staunch supporter and a pillar to him in both public and private labor, and service for the Master.

Dr. Pierson said in part: "Few people have I known from whom I learned more holy lessons than from our sister, Mrs. Dwight L. Moody. In the early days of Mr. Moody, when I first knew him, and did not at that time know Mrs. Moody, he was like an uncut stone — rude, crude, with many excrescences that needed wearing off. He was impetuous. A wonderful change came over him. He became careful, considerate, measured in word and deed, kind, thoughtful, steady, sure. As I saw him after meeting Mrs. Moody, I was convinced that she was the companion whom God had chosen to be his helpful teacher and friend. The mystery was solved when I knew both Mr. Moody and his invaluable companion. She was unobtrusive, modest, quiet. She was his teacher. Mr. Moody, himself, so expressed his great indebtedness to his wife, whom he regarded as both his counterpart and his counterpoise. There was nothing apparently uncommon or uncommonly great about her; but, like all noble characters, she was not self-assertive. Yet her power lay in her apparent powerlessness. In Mrs. Moody there were no discrepancies; but all was in keeping with good judgment, self-restraint, unselfishness, modesty, devotion to Christ. She had the habit of thinking of others, content that others should shine, while she acted as the hidden, secret spring.

Dr. Pierson repeated the words: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. Their works do follow them." Saying, "The Follow," from the original, meant, "Accompany."

The entire service was beautifully appropriate, and was a fitting tribute to the memory of a noble Christian woman.

Mrs. Moody lies beside her husband in the family plot on Round Top, East Northfield, Mass.

process. The sides of the houses are of wood, the roofs turf, and the foundation stone. Sometimes there is a hard floor, but more frequently the earth is trodden down hard and smooth. From our point of view, the homes afford little comfort; but there is a sweet, charming relation between members of the family circle, which makes the atmosphere ideal. Cut off from all the world, each family is a society unto itself, and within itself must find everything that "makes life worth the while." And they succeed, too! The snow and darkness of the night make church-going impossible during the winter months, and thus the rural people are cut off from all means of grace, so far as assembling is concerned; a privilege greatly appreciated when weather permits. They are all Lutherans. A bishop, appointed by the King of Denmark, is at the head of the church, and has under his charge 284 congregations. Some of these have pastors, others are shepherdless.

At a minister's home (who was also a farmer), I spent a Sabbath day of rest. The congregation began to assemble early in the morning, planning time for a visit, before service, and remaining for another after they had been dismissed. Their form of salutation is a kiss on each cheek. The custom is carried out by men as well as by women throughout the island.

Next day brought me to the Mount of Laws—the Thingvalla—a spot almost sacred to the islander, for upon it was evolved the national code of laws. Eighty volcanic eruptions, within historic times, had produced the scenes of desolation through which we now traveled. No sign of life or habitation; even the crow had fled before the scene. A heavy rain set in, and finally took the form of mist. With chills creeping up and down my spinal column, drenched in every shred, we traveled on in silence. Our only thought was an abiding-place for the night, and this we finally reached just outside the Thingvalla.

In the morning, we again mounted our sturdy ponies and started through the "chasm of the people." A great rent in the rock, caused by an earthquake, formed a natural pass, through which people had traveled for more than a thousand years to hear the laws read. Remarkable have been the scenes enacted upon this spot. When the present King of Denmark granted them the degree of liberty they now enjoy, and when he made a journey to Iceland, upon the occasion of the celebration of the thousandth year of settlement, he brought them a new constitution. There, upon the Mount of Laws, where the first code was formulated, the king delivered to the assembled multitude the right that has made them practically a self-governing people. The legislative body now meets in a fine stone house in the southern capital, every two years.

Besides fishing, the people are engaged in stock-raising. Sheep are numerous on the hillsides, where they subsist chiefly upon mountain moss. These pastures are rented from the government at a very small rate. The shorn wool is stored until the winter, when the spinning-wheel and hand loom are taken down, and the women enter upon their usual occupation for the period of darkness. There is a sufficient yield of grass in the valleys that affords hay for the stock during the winter months. This grass is scarcely more than six inches long; but the roots are twice as long as the blades, and intertwine so as to form a heavy weather-proof mass, which is taken up as sod and used for a covering for the hay, and also for the roofs of houses. For fuel, peat bogs are dug and turned up to the sun. These supply the sole fuel for the long months of cold and darkness. In all departments of work the women stand side by side with men. They hire out for field hands, peat-cutters, cattle-herders. They receive one-third less compensation than the men for the same hours and an equal amount of work. Added to this, they prepare the meals, keep the house in order, and care for the children. At all times of the year the women crowd more toil into the hours than do the men. Nowhere is it a greater truism that "women's work is never done." The large degree of physical strength of the entire race, makes it possible for the women to take part in the heaviest labor and not "give out nervously." Yet with all their activities, the women are educated and refined. Iceland is beautiful, restful and fascinating; well worth the time spent in a journey to this country and its people.

THE NARROW GATE

by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.
Author of "In His Steps."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Frank Douglas, having finished his student career, has an inspiration to be of some service in the world. With the aid of President Gray, of Lincoln College, the young graduate secures control of the Beacon, a small weekly paper at Colby, a place with fifteen churches and ten saloons." At the very outset of his editorial career he encounters bitter opposition of Mayor Bartlett of Colby, who is in league with the saloon interest. The young editor finds some good friends, among them Rev. Mr. Edwards, a merchant, and his wife, Rev. Vernon, a local pastor, and others. Mayor Bartlett and his followers attempt to frighten and bulldoze Douglas into selling the Beacon, but he resolutely declines. The Mayor thereupon starts a rival paper, the Sentinel. A local campaign is opening, in which the liquor interest resolves to make a bold effort for complete supremacy in the county. Douglas puts the Beacon squarely on record as opposed to the whisky element. His bold policy alienates many readers and advertisers; but he perseveres. His vigorous attacks on the saloons, supplemented by the cordial co-operation of the small but enthusiastic temperance element in Colby arouse attention throughout the county. The saloon party becomes alarmed and resolves to quiet this "disturber." Through the machinations of Mayor Bartlett, Douglas' foreman is persuaded to leave him in the lurch at a critical moment; his office is attacked, and his supply of white paper stopped at the mills. Somehow, he surmounts these difficulties, although the Beacon is driven to the temporary expedient of printing on wrapping paper, which creates sensation, and brings to its side many new friends.

Amid all his troubles, Douglas is greatly cheered by the sympathy of Miss Esther Harris, a pretty old school-teacher, who was his former college classmate. "Quits," a poor, homeless, drunken tramp, whom Douglas befriends and rescues, turns out a valuable aid, being a capable compositor and printer. "Quits" and George, the ubiquitous office-boy, more than once save the edition. "Quits," however, has frequent relapses, and these are a sore trial to the young editor, who, through his repeatedly searching for him in the saloons, comes in contact with many sad phases of the infamous drink traffic.

One evening, while he was looking for "Quits" in the saloons, Douglas witnesses a tragedy. Two young men, who have just emerged from a saloon, quarrel near the door of Mr. Vernon's church, and one shoots the other dead. The crime stirs all Colby, but the sensation is short-lived. So potent is the influence of the liquor element that when the case comes to trial, the slayer is acquitted, the plea of self-defence. When election day comes, the license ticket wins, and the friends of temperance reform are defeated all over the country. They are not discouraged, however, but decide to try on the campaign with greater vigor than before, and to trust results to a higher Power. A great temperance picnic of 4,000 people, including seven Union Sunday Schools in Payson township, is arranged, and for the purpose of disseminating prohibition ideas, Esther Harris agrees to read the first chapter of a story entitled "His Mother's Prayers," the second and concluding chapter to be read by Douglas. It is a really local experience, with the names only slightly veiled, and the facts easily recognizable. The great audience sits spellbound, as the story of a ruined family and a broken-hearted mother is graphically told. Over three thousand persons sign the pledge, as the result of the story. The picnic is declared a phenomenal success.

CHAPTER VIII.—Continued

"If what?" Esther laughed, Douglas looked so troubled.

"If we were married," replied Douglas, and it was Esther's turn to show confusion.

"Well, I don't see anything to hinder," remarked Mr. Edwards. "Here is Mr. Vernon, and if he'll wait here ten minutes I'll get the license for you. It's a little hidden to provide all the cake and fixings that we can open a can of something, and there's a pie in the pantry or I'm mistaken; eh, George?"

"Am I invited?" asked George, in his excitement getting up on one elbow.

"To what?" asked Mr. Edwards.

"To the wedding."

"Oh! I thought may be you meant to the pie. Of course you're invited. Where's my hat, Julia?"

Douglas had led Esther to the other end of the room. They were having an animated talk together. Finally, they came back to the group near George's bed.

"Esther has promised to marry me—" began Douglas, and Mr. Edwards exclaimed, "Good for her!" and started towards the door, his wife laughingly pulling at his coat.

"Promised to marry me as soon as the High School term is out next spring."

"It was the only way I could prevail on the foolish one to take the money!" cried Esther, blushing, but looking supremely happy.

"I don't see why you couldn't have it done right here and now," grumbled Edwards. "Esther will not look half so pretty nor healthy after she's slaved for several months over the bride's trousseau. Esther is so much given over to love of fine clothes."

"I have very little money to spend for dresses now?" Esther said merrily as she put the one hundred dollars into Douglas' hands again. He took it gravely, and not even Esther knew the depth of the vow he registered that day to prove worthy of her unbounded faith in him and the paper. It made him tremble to think that this unselfish, whole-hearted, buoyant spirit was joined to his life for better for worse. He felt deeply humble in the face of that human divine companionship, and thanked God for it, as for a gift beyond the possibility of purchase by earth's wealth, a gift of the Almighty to the children of men, to cheer and bless them as they journeyed together over the path of life.

"FARMER SAGE POURED OUT A GREAT HEAP OF SMALL COIN AND BILLS"

But neither Douglas nor Esther nor any of the friends of the Beacon realized the force of the sentiment that was created for the paper by the attempt made to wipe it out. There was no direct proof that the saloon element was guilty, but Anderson County and Colby jumped at the conclusion, and after-events demonstrated the accuracy of their conclusions. Mayor Bartlett at once offered Douglas the use of his office for the publication of the Beacon, and in a manly editorial in the Sentinel, denounced the outrage as an act of barbarism. Douglas felt again that in some ways the Mayor was not totally depraved, and gave him credit at least for newspaper courtesy of the orthodox sort. He did not, however, accept the Mayor's offer; not for personal reasons, but because the way unexpectedly opened for him to print the Beacon on his own press.

He was in Mr. Edwards' store three days after the explosion, talking over with him the facts about his mail, which had begun to increase with every delivery, and telling Mr. Edwards of the surprising contents of some of the letters he was receiving.

"Nearly a hundred dollars was sent in in small sums by subscribers all over the country. What do you think of that?"

"Think it's a sign of the times," Edwards replied promptly. "You'll have that press all right. Might as well open up your office in Clark's building. He told me this morning that you could have it if you wanted it. The location isn't bad, and the rent won't be as high as on the street."

Douglas went down to see the building that afternoon, and found it better than he had supposed. He at once moved into the building with some cheap office furniture. Two days later, while looking over his mail, with Quits looking over a case of type which had been collected from the ruins of the Beacon office, Farmer Sage walked in and greeted Douglas heartily.

"Brought you a few subscriptions," he said, after asking a few questions about the explosion.

He put his hands in his big overcoat pocket, and poured out on the desk in front of Douglas a great heap of small coin and bills.

"One hundred and seventy-five dollars, I make it," he said. "And here's a list of the subscribers." He handed the astonished editor a paper containing fifty names of farmers in Payson Township.

"Take Dawson never did a better day's work for the Beacon in all his life, if he was the man who had anything to do with that bomb. You'd be surprised if you knew how many friends that outrage has made for you. No thanks. It's no more than your due. Give us the best paper on earth and you'll find us all right. I've marked those who have paid for the paper, and all the rest is voluntary contributions. There'll be a little more and I'll send it in."

That afternoon, by Mr. Edwards' advice, Douglas wrote to a firm in Clinton for a press. He knew just what he wanted, and the Clinton firm promptly responded. Before the end of that week the new press was being set up in the new quarters, and the proudest man in all Colby was Quits, as he helped the Clinton man and Douglas to put it together.

They were at work at it when Mr. Edwards came in, and asked Douglas to stop a moment. Douglas sat down with his friend, and Edwards, with an astonishing wink of satisfaction, asked:

"How much are the contributions up to date?"

Douglas figured a moment.

"Five hundred and thirty-four dollars and fifty-three cents. Esther's contribution was $100. Mr. Sage brought in $175 and has sent in $23.78 since. And I've received by mail $235.75. I am simply overwhelmed, Mr. Edwards, by this. It is like a story."

"So are most things in real life. Thought maybe you might need a little something for type and paper, so I brought in this."

He took out a paper and laid it down in front of the astonished young editor.

It was a list of business men and church members, including a great many women, who had contributed to the fund for starting the paper again. Mr. Edwards had headed the list with $100, and had been circulating it himself quietly from the very day after the explosion. Douglas almost lost his breath when he read the total at the foot of the list. It summed up $417, and ensured the purchase not only of the new press, but type and paper and other necessary fixtures for the office.

He sat looking at his friend with his eyes dim and his heart full.

"How can I thank you, dear friend?"

"Don't try," said Mr. Edwards, huskily. "Give us the best paper going. The people are getting with you. That bomb was heard all over the State. And it wrecked more saloons than all the prayers of the churches or I'm a sinner. It was better for you than a fire on an old building covered with insurance. Good luck to you. No, I won't stop. It's your busy day. If you need any one to open your mail I'll send Banks over."

He went out, as he usually did, on the run, and Douglas, feeling as if the whole explosion was a dream, went over to help finish putting the new press in order.

It was no dream, however, and on the list the group of friends will see many times the event when, a few days later, the first numbers of the new Beacon in its fresh dress of type came off the new press. Mr. and Mrs. Edwards, Esther, Mr. Vernon and his wife, and half a dozen interested friends were present, including George, who was almost well, and hobbled down to the new office with the help of a pair of crutches.

"You must have been living on fat at the Edwards'," said Quits, as George stood by the press and smelled it as a horse might smell a favorite mare.

WORLD'S TEMPERANCE LESSON ❋ THE CURSE OF STRONG DRINK

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON FOR NOV. 22
PROV. 20: 1; 23: 20, 21, 29-35

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

GOLDEN TEXT--PROV. 20: 1: "WINE IS A MOCKER"

WINE is a mocker. Centuries of deadly delusion are summed up in that saying. In Bible times wine was the most common intoxicating drink. Distillation, by which separate alcohol and distilled liquors were produced, was invented in the twelfth century. Wine proved a mocker, for it promised joy, but really brought sorrow. It promised strength, but really produced weakness. It was called the "social glass," but it turned friends into fighting foes. It was drunk as "health," but proved disease. Yet for ages men believed its false promises, and many of those reputed "wise," proved themselves not so, by being "deceived thereby." The Bible taught, in Proverbs and other passages, that wine is the chief cause of quarrels, the chief cause of poverty, the ally of lust and all other evils, and commanded us not even to "look" at it; but not until the nineteenth century did even the most advanced churches advocate abstinence from this deceiving destroyer; though there were a few individual advocates of abstinence at an earlier time. In 1836, American temperance societies and churches in convention assembled, gave up the fruitless "moderation" movements, and also the fallacy that alcohol taken in beer and wine, instead of brandy and whiskey, would do no harm. They worked hard to save drunkards by pledging them not to drink; but with open saloons inviting them to drink all along their path, most of them fell into their old habits again. All sorts of "restrictive" license laws failed to restrict, and so in 1850 the churches generally declared in favor of prohibitory laws, by which it should be made "as hard as possible to do wrong, and as easy as possible to do right." With the increase of immigration, of cities, and of prosperity, the consumption of liquors has increased in our country, until it is now at its highest tide, twenty gallons per capita, with corresponding increase of evil consequences in the home, in business, and in politics, all of which lose when the liquor habit gains.

ORIENTAL WINE CUP

This, in brief, is the history of the temperance movement, which we may appropriately recall on this annual world's temperance Sunday, especially because history is the best exposition of what is at once our golden text, and the lesson's opening verse. But alas, "wine is a mocker" still, in spite of all past exposures of its tricks. As confidence men use over and over again the trick of greeting a stranger as an old friend, and then lure him into some resort and get his money by some gambling trick or other robbery, so the same tricks with which wine fooled Noah, and Alexander the Great, are used successfully in our own land to-day. Still, in the name of friendship, men take that which has made many a man kill his best friend. The story is an old one, and in substance has been true of many a wrecked home, of the man who in drunken madness killed the wife he dearly loved. He knew nothing of his act nor of the imprisonment that followed till he awoke the next day, and inquired, "Where am I?" "In prison." "What for?" "For murder." "Does my wife know?" "You have murdered her." Then came madness indeed. And that is the stuff people have taken for centuries to manifest friendship! "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Wine is especially a mocker in that even when a man's neighbors all see he is a slave of drink, he commonly thinks himself in no danger. Let us challenge our drinking friends to let the drink alone for a whole week to see whether the liking for it has not already a stronger hold on them than they think. It is a good rule for even wider application, "I make myself no necessities." Here is an apropos story:

"This red flag is a signal of danger, Nannie," said the tall engineer, as he gave his daughter a little red flag. "A signal, father?" How Nannie's blue eyes were lifted toward her father in anxious inquiry. "Yes, it means danger. If anything is not just right, that red flag on the railroad track is a sign, and the engineer will stop his train." "Would you stop yours, father?" "I rather think so, Nannie Payson. If I didn't, there would be trouble. What I have given you is only a toy flag, but you may like to play with it." Nannie was an enthusiastic child. She eagerly seized the toy flag, and delightedly played with it. Her father had scarcely left the room to hurry off to his train, when she heard her mother sighing, "Oh, dear!" Then her mother cried. "Oh, I wouldn't cry!" urged Nannie, throwing her arms about her mother's neck. "Tell me what is the matter." The mother hated to say. "I know why it is." She went to a closet and opened the door. She pointed to a black bottle on a shelf. "That is it, mother." The mother nodded her head. "It is growing on him, Nannie. He does not think so, but he drinks more than he used to, and he drinks oftener. He will lose his place on the road the next thing." The fumes of the whisky the engineer had taken escaped from the closet into the room. "He thinks people don't know, but they can't help knowing. Just as the smell of it is coming out of the closet, the trouble gets out, and everybody knows it, Nannie. You can't hide it." What could Nannie do? She resolved to do one thing the next day, though she made up her mind with fear and trembling. When the engineer went to the closet the next morning, he saw the toy flag beside the bottle, red beside the black, the danger signal near the drink of death, and so the father was saved.

The Irish Temperance League Journal shows what a mocker wine is in the following list of excuses for using drink as a medicine, with the answers made by great doctors to their self-deceiving words:

Mr. A.—I must have a little wine because my blood is poor. Dr. Kerr—Alcohol injures the blood.

Mr. B.—I can't do without a little because I suffer from indigestion. Dr. Bowman—Alcohol retards digestion.

Mr. C.—I have brain fever and I need alcohol. Sir Henry Thompson—Of all the people who cannot stand alcohol it is the brain workers.

Mr. D.—I am rather nervous and, therefore, I take a little. Dr. Brunton—The effect of alcohol upon the nervous system is to paralyze it.

Mr. E.—I suffer with my liver, so I take a little occasionally. Dr. Norman Kerr—Alcohol hardens the liver.

Mr. F.—I am a victim to kidney disease, that is my reason for taking alcohol. Dr. Norman Kerr—Alcohol destroys the kidneys.

Mr. G.—I am weak and need something to strengthen my muscles. Sir B. Richardson—The action of alcohol is to lessen the muscular power.

Mr. H.—I have to work in a cold place, and must have some alcohol to warm me. Dr. John Rae—The greater the cold the more injurious is the use of alcohol.

Mr. I.—I don't get enough food, so I rely upon a little alcohol to supply extra food to nourish me. Dr. J. C. Reid—There is no support to the body in the use of alcohol.

Mr. J.—I have to undergo an operation and I must take a little. Dr. Bantock—I believe that all classes of operation are better without alcohol.

Mrs. K.—I have a little babe to nurse, and therefore I have to take stout. Dr. Heywood Smith—It is a popular mistake to think that the drinking of stout makes you better nurses.

Mr. L.—I feel low sometimes, so it is needful for me. Dr. Wilkes—Alcohol is a depresser, and people are under a delusion who think otherwise.

Mr. M.—I am rather "run down," and I have to take a little alcohol to build me up. The Lancet—As an agent for producing degeneration alcohol is unrivalled.

Mr. N.—I have a weak heart, that is my reason. Dr. Sims Woodhead—I never use brandy for heart; hot milk is better.

Mr. O.—I have a complication of complaints. I am forced to take it. Dr. Dickson, Canada—Alcohol is the most destructive agent to every organ and tissue of the body, either in a state of health or disease.

Another way in which wine has long been a successful mocker is in the plea so often made by men whose liberal education should have taught them better, that the desire for intoxicants is a universal human craving that will be satisfied in one way if not another, and therefore, we might as well stop our efforts whether for voluntary abstinence or enforced prohibition. World's Temperance Sunday is a good time to deal this ignorant plea a death blow, by making the cheering fact universally known, that half the world's population never tasted alcohol in any form nor their fathers nor grandfathers before them. Total abstinence is the one great virtue of the heathen religions, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Mohammedanism, which, together present about seven hundred millions of living refutations of the lazy plea that it is no use to work against the drink curse because all peoples are under its spell. White men are breaking down this one virtue in hundreds of heathen with whom they associate in military, civil and educational circles, but it is only hundreds among millions of these Oriental abstainers who have yet been corrupted, and World's Temperance Sunday ought to be so used as to stay the tide of rum and opium that is pouring into heathen lands from so-called "Christian lands," whose bad men do this hellish work under permission of "Christian governments," because "Christian citizens," who have the ability, and so the responsibility to stop it, are too busy with the mint, anise and cummin of religion to attend to this "weightier matter of the law." Just now the battle to which the teachers at least, in every American Sunday School, should furnish re-enforcement, is that which seeks to influence the President to adopt in the Philippines, Japan's successful policy of prohibiting opium sales except for medical prescriptions. We halted at a half victory when the proposed opium monopoly was defeated, but must rally again to put Japan's righteous plan in its place.

For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty. This old, old story of rum and rags becomes very near to a man when the drunkenness of some relative puts a whole family on him for support. The slums lead a few to rum—that is the quarter truth in Henry George's view that drunkenness is the result of poverty—but three-fourths of the dependents were made so by somebody's drinking, by which he first wasted his money, and then lost his chance to earn it. Here it is appropriate to set before the boys the tremendous argument for abstinence from the new policy of railroads, which have lost so much by accidents, due to drink, that they now generally require abstinence in their employees, as is seen in the following summary of replies made in 1901 by forty-nine railroads, to inquiries as to what their rules were as to hiring drinking men. "Total abstinence on or off duty is required by the rules of twenty of these roads; two declare they will not employ a man who drinks, if they know it; four declare total abstinence necessary to safety in operating the road, while nineteen give the preference to teetotallers in promotions, so that practically all of the railways of the country adhere to the total abstinence standard. Of the forty-nine replies, only two have rules merely against "intemperance." In these days, when it is often hard to find employment, no boy can afford to make his chances less by a habit which in more than half the industrial establishments of the United States, as the United Bureau of Labor has shown, will be counted against him.

"THEY THAT TARRY LONG AT THE WINE; THEY THAT GO TO SEEK MIXED WINE"

Who hath woe, sorrow, contentions, wounds? In the presence of this long array of sins due to intoxicating drink, it is appropriate to quote the words of Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler: "If there be an enormous evil that is producing fearful destruction of human bodies and souls, then Christianity is bound to furnish a salvation from that evil. No one disputes Mr. Gladstone's famous declaration that war, pestilence and famine are not so destructive as the curse of strong drink. God's Word tells us that drunkenness shuts heaven against its victims. The chief enemy of Bible religion and the welfare of society is the intoxicating cup; no other has desolated so many homes, wrought such corruption in civil affairs, destroyed so many lives, and ruined so many immortal souls. If Jesus Christ established his Church for the very purpose of saving human society from its sins, then the hugest sin should command the church's most serious attention. For the Christian church to ignore the drink evil is as absurd as for the West Point Military Academy to ignore the use of artillery, or for a medical college to ignore the treatment of fevers."

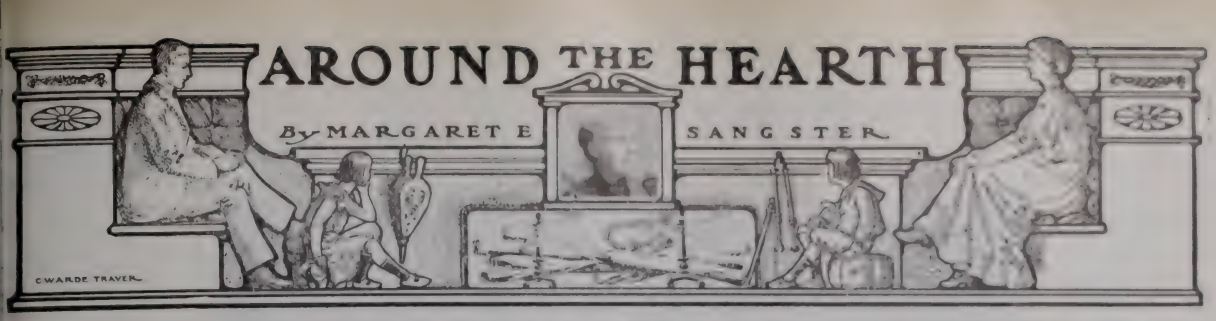
In a New Jersey town where there were not enough schoolhouses, a saloon-keeper offered his rear room for a school, and when chairs gave out the children sat on beer kegs. Let this remind us that every saloon is a school teaching old and young "contentions" and every other sin; teaching them also to compromise with sins that are hard to suppress.

* * *

Look not thou upon the wine. Here is a command to abstinence, stronger than any modern pledge. We are to keep not alone our lips but our very eyes from the wine. And this is well, for, as

There's life for a look at the Crucified One,
There is often death in a look that leads to lust or liquor. Sir Thomas Lipton, the persistent yachtsman, who is also a successful merchant, in giving advice to young men, said, in sailor phrase, "corkscrews have sunk more people than cork jackets ever saved."



TIRED MEN

TIRED women are objects of sympathy, as indeed they deserve to be, but do we not forget to have regard for the fagged out bodies and wearied nerves of tired men? The strain of his occupation on the nervous energies of a business man is excessive, and he often comes home at night utterly wearied, and goes away in the morning little refreshed. After weeks or months of incessant work and ceaseless worry, the man breaks down, perhaps has fever, or some other malady, and dies; or, his mind gives way. He is dragged down by sleeplessness and depression. The process is slow, but the result is sure. The man grows early old, loses his grip, is not able to keep the pace with others. In the household, the tired man is cross, easily fretted, very harsh with his boys, very irritable with his girls, and his wife loses patience with him, because he is so different from his former self and so unreasonable. If there is a remedy for the tired man, let it be found. He may be too far from his office, and the demand on his strength in going back and forth may be too great. The city, in its pleasant residential portions, is very expensive, and the home is often necessarily at a point remote from the store or shop.

Suburban localities offer a better background for the home and for the upbringing of children, and the man accepts the inevitable, and goes forth to his labor without a complaint. Everything in the home, in these circumstances, should minister to the husband, and serve his convenience and comfort; the nicest breakfast be his, on the table so promptly that he may eat in the morning without hurry, and the most appetizing dinner at night be ready, that he may recruit his wasted nerve tissue, and spend an evening of refreshment afterward. On the part of the man himself, and of the family, there should be a determined effort to be on time in the morning, so that the desperate, headlong rush to catch a train, which is enough to shorten many a life, need not have an excuse. Wherever it is possible, let the man live as near his business as is compatible with other obligations and duties.

Men grow tired, half to death and wholly to despair, because they cannot make money enough to support their families as they desire to. It is not merely a haste to be rich, that induces men to work early and late, and causes them to fret, and weighs them down with a load of melancholy; it is an urgent wish to keep the family credit up, to pay the bills, to meet the increasing and imperious demands of an age that is encumbered with artificial wants.

To men, more than to women, the breaking point comes in middle life. They keep on steadily, joyously, gallantly, until forty-four, or thence to fifty, and suddenly, the pressure of the years makes itself terribly felt. They give way, unexpectedly, as a fortress that is battered down at its weakest point. If, at this time, they may be strengthened, tided over the danger, reinforced in courage and vigor, rested from their weariness, there is a probability of their going on to old age without another period of peril.

Wives, sons, and daughters, and all who are kith and kin, should do their best to aid the tired out man, who cannot, as his wife can, take bits of rest through the day, and thus relieve the strain on aching muscles and fagged out brain.

A Wholesome Girl

"She is such a wholesome girl!"

The phrase lingered in memory. It is beautifully descriptive of a type of girlhood that we love; of the natural young girl, who puts on no silly airs and graces, who is full and cheery with other young people, who has no fussy self-consciousness when with boys, and who is an agreeable and pleasant companion in her home. Such a girl usually has good health, bright eyes, a clear skin, and a merry laugh. Her father is proud of her, and her mother leans on her for help and receives from her sympathy.

The wholesome girl is very patient and pleasant with little children. Wherever one finds her, she is an honest, straightforward, good natured girl, with a cool hand, and a steady head, and a heart in the right place. She fears God and keeps his commandments in the days of her youth. If she marries after a while she deserves the best of husbands, and if she remains single, she will be the idol of her circle.

Old Folks' Day

In some places they keep "Old Home Week," and the scattered children come from far and near to celebrate it. In other towns and villages, they have a beautiful rallying of the most venerable citizens, and this is called "Old Folks' Day."

Such a day was observed September 13 in Vineland, N. J., where, in the First Presbyterian Church, was a notable assembly. Fourteen years ago, Rev. Dr. David King, the pastor, began preaching a special sermon annually to the aged people of the flock. This year many old people attended, of whom fifty-nine present were over 70, twenty over 80, and three over 90 years. The oldest person present received a gift, a sort of reward of merit, in the shape of a very elegant copy of the Bible. Another Bible was given to the second oldest person in the congregation. The church was decorated with sheaves of wheat and bunches of golden rod.

Age, when it is found in the way of righteousness, is worthy of all honor and reverence. The "Old Folks' Day" might be introduced everywhere, and observed just as "Children's Day" is, with psalms and flowers and organ melody.

THE COWS

Brindle, and Bess, and Brownie,
Cush, and Kringle, and Krink;
The maidens take them to pasture,
And up to the river's brink.

They are friends to the little children,
These cows with their coats of silk,
And the dimpled darlings thrive upon
Their foamy, creamy milk.

The Chime of Golden Wedding Bells

And now it is Mr. and Mrs. Jacob J. Fingerstreet, whose golden wedding day came on September 8th. They were married in New Bedford, Ohio, and settled in Worthington, Indiana. Later they made their permanent home in Nebraska City. They must have been a handsome couple in their youth, for, after fifty years of life's wear and tear, they are still much finer looking than many of their juniors. The occasion of the golden anniversary was delightful to the throng of friends and kindred who were present, one son and his wife coming from England to give their congratulations. The presents were rich and numerous, the good wishes unstinted, in which, though after the event, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD unites.

A NOVEL SETTLEMENT FOR CHILDREN

IN one of his books, Charles Dickens has drawn a picture of a London street boy, who is also a true portrait of the New York tenement-house boy of to-day. "I am always a-moving on, sir," said poor Joe, the street waif. "I've always been a-moving on ever since I was born. Where can I move to now, sir, no more than I do move?" This pathetic question is asked to-day by thousands of tenement children in New York City, and the public has no answer. There is no place for the boy in the tenements; there is no room for him, no welcome. The public schools are a real blessing to this class of children. But the hard days come when they leave school, and are either out in the streets or working in dingy factories, where

Still all day the iron wheels go onward,
Grinding life down from its mark.

THE "HAPPY THOUGHT CIRCLE" AT WORK

Certainly, there is no sadder sight in all the world than a repressed, neglected, lonely child. To these boys and girls a glimpse of real home life, where love and kindness reign, where the sun shines through the windows, is a foretaste of paradise itself.

In One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, New York, there has recently been established "The Neighborhood Home," in a little red brick two-story and basement house, which has a very homelike exterior. Within a few short months, this settlement has come to be the meeting-place of children of all ages, creeds and nationalities, eager to learn, enthusiastic and appreciative. There is nothing which so appeals to the child of the street as the idea of home. This seems to be inherent in the nature of children of all nationalities the world over. The little ones of the neglected classes do not know by actual experience what a home is like; but they have visions of what such a place should be, and they readily respond to the refining influences of a home atmosphere, as the flower turns to the sun, unfolding its beauty and pouring forth its fragrance, little by little, in the warmth of loving-kindness.

Jacob Riis has said that "it is the men, women and children who use the house, that make the settlement. Four things," he writes, "are necessary to constitute one, namely: a building fitted for educational and social work, continuous services in and flowing out from it, a body of workers, and a neighborhood in need of such ministrations." The managers of "The Neighborhood Home" believe that they have practically all of the essentials.

The house is so arranged that the caretakers may have a home in the basement, having their living rooms undisturbed by the crowds of boys and girls who throng the other floors. On the first floor are two assembly rooms, one serving for a library and reading room, and both as class-rooms. On the second floor there is a tiny kitchen, fitted up with the necessary utensils for a cooking-school. There is also a dining-room, where the little home-makers receive their first lessons in table setting and serving a meal, and a bed-room, which is used for the progressive lessons in housekeeping. When these classes are not in session, the rooms are used for the club meetings and for social and industrial work.

In the organization of clubs and classes the managers have tried to meet the needs of this special field. Mrs. L. J. P. Bishop, the Superintendent, believes in giving the children what they call for. She has encouraged class organization, and when practicable, self-government. It is interesting to note that of their own accord the children have chosen industrial as well as social features. They have shown taste and good judgment in the selection of their officers, rewarding the quiet, unobtrusive one by electing them to the highest positions; emphatically denouncing all office-seekers, and absolutely refusing to exchange votes or to be unduly influenced by the self-seeking. Many of the names selected by the club members are unique. The basket-weaving classes are appropriately named for the Indian tribes. Some of the girls' clubs are named for the poets, while others bear such names as "The Pansy Circle," "The Happy Thought," etc. The boys' gymnastic classes are known by college names, the "Yale," "Princeton," and "Columbia." One club name which has been the subject of comment is the "Crystal Social Club." A glance into their room on Wednesday night will reveal a class of twelve boys from the ages of twelve to seventeen. They are greatly interested in clay modeling. Another group is known as the "Riverdale Club." They are proud of their name and their leaders, as well as of their occupation, which is chair-caning.

"GARDEN CLUB" OF "THE NEIGHBORHOOD HOME"

A number of young college women have been giving their time and services to the Home. There are nineteen volunteer workers altogether, and the staff is continually increasing. The Settlement is a young people's work, and it is a matter for congratulation that so many have responded to the appeal of the child, and are giving time and strength and money to the work of saving the children of the great New York East Side. While under the auspices of the New York City Baptist Mission Society, the work is interdenominational and non-sectarian. All extension work—such as educational classes, clubs, music courses, etc.,—is dependent upon voluntary gifts.

There is no longer any doubt that children may be won from the streets through such settlements as "The Neighborhood Home." The settlement does not in any way strive to displace the church; its mission is to supplement the work of the church. Dean Hodges says: "The settlement is not a church, but a religion itself may be expressed in revealing the beauty of the human life, to live the motto of our Lord, not to be ministered unto, but to minister. Beneath the settlement's roof, he writes, "the blind begin to see, the lame begin to walk, the poor hear the good news of the Gospel, that blessed Gospel of the love of God, which is interpreted by the service of man." That is the keynote of the work at "The Neighborhood Home." The men and women who are giving their services, strive to hold up high ideals of Christian living, to develop the heart and conscience, as well as the intellect. They believe that the Bible teaches that the "Redeemed soul is also the Saviour of the body," and they believe in the graduated growth of righteousness, through the linking together of physical, mental, and spiritual culture.

"Who is my neighbor?" asked one of old, seeking to justify himself to the Master. "He who needs the help that thou canst give," recite the little children at "The Neighborhood Home," as the happy days go by, making up the years that will bring these boys and girls of to-day, to be the men and women of to-morrow.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

Mrs. J. W., Spring Hill, Kan. "I desire to express through your paper my gratitude to God for answering prayer. I asked for counsel and guidance and he has answered in a remarkable manner."

M. A. H., Sutherland, Fla. "God does answer prayers. I prayed earnestly and the answer came immediately."

Reader, North Colebrook, Conn. "I have a great deal of faith in prayer, and have had many prayers answered. Recently, I had an answer to a prayer, when I was in great trouble. 'Watch and pray lest ye enter into temptation.'"

Reader, Virginia. "I was very much perplexed as to what I should do. I prayed earnestly to my Heavenly Father. He heard and answered. 'Blessed be his holy name.'"

Reader, Springfield, Mass. "I want to testify that God answers prayers. I believe sincerely that he answers what one prays for, if it is for the best."

Mrs. M., Mountain Home, Va. "Several months ago, I was in great trouble and distress. I prayed earnestly to my Heavenly Father for help and relief. He heard and released me, and I thank him for it all."

C. E. H., Chicago. "My prayers have been answered so many times, in fact I hardly remember a time when my prayers have not been answered. Pray to God for help in all things, as he is the greatest helper we can ever have."

P. W. C., Whistler, Ala. "God surely hears and answers the prayers of his children, whether they ask for physical, temporal, or spiritual blessings. He does not always give just what we ask, but time often proves that it was better not. God's answer 'No,' may bring far richer blessings than the answer 'Yes.' I have proved him many times, and it is my chief joy to feel that I have a loving Heavenly Father, who cares for me, and everything that concerns me."

Mrs. E. C. K., Kingstree, S. C. "I prayed the Lord to avert a great sorrow. He heard me. Many times has he sent me an answer when I have carried even my little troubles to him."

Teddie, Mass. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. I called upon him in deep distress and he answered."

K., Lima, O. "I know God answers prayers, for in his own good time he answered my prayer and gave me far more than I asked for."

M. C. P., Denver, Col. "I take great pleasure in reading these answers to prayer in THE HERALD. Sometimes, almost before I was done praying, the answer has come to me."

Mrs. E. McK., Central Village, Conn. "I want to testify that God does answer prayers, as he has done so for me many times."

Subscriber, Cedar Mills, O. "I am glad to testify that God has answered prayers for me, not only once, but many times. In financial trouble and in sorrow he has heard and answered. Though he may not always answer in the way that seemeth best to us, yet 'he doeth all things well.'"

A Wife, Ottawa, Ill. "I wish to acknowledge an answer to prayer. God heard and answered. Praise his holy name."

Reader, Rhode Island. "The Lord has answered prayer for me."

Mrs. J. D. L., Jefferson, Ill. "God has answered many prayers of mine. My dear mother also feels that her prayers are often answered."

Letters acknowledging answers to prayer have also been received from B. S., Shawono, Wis.; Mrs. F. I. McC., Sheridan, Mont.; M. C. Lexington, Neb.; R. R. R., Aimville, Pa.; Reader, Plainfield, N. J.; Reader, Jenners, Pa.; Reader, Elkton, Oreg., and many others.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Sleep and Insomnia*

IT is only the sleepless, the poets, and the medical journals who put the proper value upon sleep. Fortunately for the world, many millions of men never worry about going to sleep. All they seem to need is to find time; for even without a bed for sleep-seeking—sleep comes to them.

But to many the sleep problem is as important and as terrifying as that other overwhelming query—"how to digest."

It is worth while to help solve these problems; for the most useful work that is done in this world is work that uses up the nerves and fatigues the brain, causing sleeplessness, and the suffering that accompanies it.

The worn-out sufferer from insomnia, declaring himself ready to sacrifice his fortune for a few years of his allotted lifetime — Shakespeare, with his "sleep that knits up the raveled sleeve of care," and the doctors, with their diatribes against the sleep-destroying modern life, are the ones who truly appreciate sleep, not those who have the power of sinking calmly and promptly to rest.

Unfortunately, modern conditions are rapidly putting all the world in the appreciative frame of mind of the sleepless. Nerve specialists say that there never before was a time when the people needed to sleep so uninterruptedly and so long, to repair the ravages of too tense and too noisy living as now; and there never was a time when they were so little able to sleep as they should, because of these very conditions which make abundant sleep necessary.

Sleep follows the diminution of blood in the cerebral vessels. The blood is squeezed out of the brain like water from a sponge, and it becomes in a measure bloodless. This bloodless condition is indispensable; without it sleep cannot be induced. Wakefulness means a full flow of blood through the brain. Whatever, then, tends to withdraw the blood from the brain tends to produce sleep.

In perfectly healthy persons, leading a perfectly normal life, this change is automatic. The blood ebbs away from the brain because it is time the brain had rest, and sleep slowly steals the senses. But there are not many perfectly healthy persons in these days, and the perfectly normal life is even rarer.

Mental activity requires just the opposite condition. Severe mental labor must be fed by means of an increased blood supply. We recognize this when we notice how red and congested becomes the face of any one who is making a mental exertion—a public speaker for example. All the blood vessels of the head are affected by this congestion. The mental energy exerted uses up force, which must be replaced at once. Nature, therefore, sends blood to these parts on a hurry call to re-supply the cells with vitality.

Anger and fits of passion use up more mental energy than physical labor, no matter how exhausting the work may be. Naturally irritable, nervous people are subject to insomnia. Repeated attacks of the brain congestion which accompany anger, weaken the walls of the blood vessels in the head, and cause a dangerous passive congestion which prevents natural sleep.

During mental exertion of any kind, the cerebral vessels become distended, owing to the increased volume of blood they contain, and they remain in this condition as long as the exertion is continued. If it be too intense, or if it be persevered in for too long a period, the vessels lose their contractibility, and remain in a permanently enlarged state. They are not able to contract, and wakefulness is the result; for when the blood vessels are unable to empty themselves, the power to sleep is gone. Just like the rubber bands often use around big packages, and leave undisturbed for a long time, which we try to use again, only to find their elasticity gone.

We often hear thoughtless people say, "work never kills." I doubt if physical labor ever does, nor healthy, well arranged work, however exhausting. But I cannot paint too strongly, the evils of badly balanced mental overwork, or the disastrous consequences of that unvarying, or excessive work, which gradually irritates the nervous system to the snapping point; when the occasional disturbed sleep becomes that of utter sleeplessness.

Sound nervous structures properly nourished, adequately rested, and rightly exercised, are fundamental desiderata for good sleep; on the other hand, all circumstances interfering with the health, nutrition, repose, or the even placid working of the nervous textures, are decidedly detrimental to the function of sleep.

New York, Old and New: Its Story, Streets and Landmarks, by Rufus Rockwell Wilson, in two volumes, illustrated. The author has put in compact form and in a delightfully entertaining manner, the story of the metropolis from the earliest days up to the present time. While the style is that of the judicious and impartial historian, the work is crowded with reminiscences and anecdotes that give it a value and interest rarely found in books of this description. It is especially rich in what Mr. Wilson happily terms "the small talk of history"—those personal incidents and social passages that give color and character to the narrative as no mere historical record, however complete, could give. It is an excellent substitute for the more ponderous histories, whose very bulk and verbosity make them unavailable for the general reader. Price $3.50. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia and London, Publishers.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Reader, Middletown, Conn. What is the origin of the expression, going through fire and water?

It probably comes from the ancient custom of the ordeal. The Psalmist uses it (66: 12) in reference to his nation having been tried as silver is tried. In ancient times, a person charged with a crime was blindfolded and set to walk among red-hot ploughshares. If he could do so without touching them, he was declared innocent. A woman charged with being a witch was sometimes thrown into the water as an ordeal. If she sank, she was declared innocent; if she swam or floated, she was declared guilty.

S. J. M., Avanelle, Miss. We have a much controverted subject in our neighborhood—in regard to hypnotism. Some believe there is such a science; others believe there is no such thing. We have chosen you to give us an answer.

Hypnotism is not a science. It is a pseudo, or quack science, and is at the present time chiefly in the hands of humbugs and impostors, who deceive credulous people and make money out of them. Animal magnetism (which is the basis of so-called hypnotism) is as subtle and difficult to define as electricity. All persons possess it, in some degree, but none to such an extent that they are able to control at will the thoughts and actions of others, although humbugs will try to make people believe so. It is a comparatively easy matter for a sharp fellow, with the collusion of paid subjects, to hoodwink an average audience.

F. P., Detroit Harbor, Wis. How was it the Hebrews were allowed (as stated in Deut. 14; 21) to give or sell to an alien that which they were forbidden to eat themselves? Would it be right, on the same principle, for a Christian to give or sell liquor to persons who are not Christians?

The cases are not parallel. The permission related to food ceremonially unclean. The prohibition of certain kinds of food was not given to the foreigner but to the race whom God wished to separate from all others, making them a peculiar people. As the foreigner was not under the law he committed no offence in eating that which a Hebrew could not eat without disobedience. In the case of liquor, it is not a ceremonial but a very practical duty. As it is liable to injure the man, we are bound, by concern for his welfare, not to give it or sell it to him.

James L. C., Great Falls, Mont. In your MAIL-BAG for August 20, L. McD. asks for the origin of the myth of the phœnix bird. About 1854, Dr. Wm. D. Dorris, of Nashville, Tenn., in a lecture on the human soul, made a statement substantially as follows: "The ashes of any animal or plant, properly prepared, placed in a glass vessel, hermetically sealed and exposed to the rays of the sun and moon for two years, will, about the expiration of that time, show a transparent likeness of the animal or plant whose ashes were used." He believed a knowledge of this fact among the ancients originated the fable of the phœnix rising from its ashes. This statement of Dr. Dorris seems to give scientific basis for the spiritual body of I. Cor. 15: 44; also for the "Shadow Land" of Indian faith.

We have read the same statement many years ago, but considered it a scientific conceit, or the vision of an imaginative dreamer. There is no more reason to believe that the material eye can see or that the material senses perceive purely immaterial things in such a case, than to suppose that we could distinguish with our human vision, the "cloud of witnesses" spoken of by Paul. If a "transparent likeness" were visible under the glass, it would still be purely material, however attenuated.

F. B. H., Hyde Park, Mass. Did the Jews in the time of Christ forbid intermarriage with foreigners?

There has never been a time since the origin of the Hebrew nation when such marriages were not forbidden, and it is to this day contrary to their law. The marriages do take place, but they are always deplored by the friends of the Jewish partner, and the practice is rigorously discouraged. At the time of the return from Babylon, Nehemiah took a firm stand on the subject (Nehemiah 13: 23–27). The prohibition of such marriages is given in Deut. 7: 3, and other passages.

P. B. Knowles, Calif. What state of society would prevail if the Christian ideal or hope was realized; that is, if every one now living in the United States were to become true Christians? How would business be run and on what lines? Would there be any poor or rich? Would there be any use for money? Would every one have the same chance or opportunity to use nature's resources? Would any one ever have to go to bed hungry because they were unable to procure food?

In the ideal Christian commonwealth, there would be an end to trade competition of the sort which drives many to the wall, that a few may thrive. Employers would treat employees equitably and even generously, and the latter would return this treatment in faithful, intelligent service. There would be no corners, pools or combinations. No speculative market to rule the prices of crops, coal, and other commodities; no stock speculation in the Wall Street sense, and no vast fortunes would be possible, since each member of society would employ all his energies and resources for the uplift and improvement of the whole community. Interest and usury would be unknown. Taxes would be such only as were needed to administer the community's affairs, and do its actual work. Legitimate enterprise would develop the highest resources of nature for the benefit of all. Love would make each the servant of the whole, and the servant would be honored by all. Art, science, and a varied culture would flourish, and the general intellectual horizon would widen, as the hard struggle no longer engrossed man's time, strength and physical and mental energies. Leaders and followers there still would be, of course, but there could be neither a rich nor a poor class. Money might, and possibly would survive the change, but it would no longer be the magnet of mankind and the source of so much evil. And the love of Christ and his service would sweeten the new life to all who were participants in it.

R. J., Bremen, O. Why were the monks and nuns expelled from France by the present government?

No very clear statement of the situation has been given, so far as we have seen, but our understanding of the trouble is that the various Orders were required to register themselves and to submit to inspection. Only those were expelled who refused to comply with the law. The objection made, we believe, was that the monks regarded the law as an attempt to secularize the system of education.

Reader, St. Louis, Mo. Is it wrong to go to the theatre to see the play of Ben Hur?

As with games of cards, dancing, etc., we are obliged to consider the influence of an act on others beside the question whether it is right or wrong. Say that a Christian settles it in his mind conscientiously that it is not wrong to see such a play, and we can easily understand his doing so. He goes to the theatre and sees the play. Some young people seeing him there may conclude, without taking into account the character of the play, that as he attends the theatre, there is no harm in their doing so, and they do not discriminate on the character of the plays, but go to any that are put on the boards. Of course, they ought not to draw an inference from one attendance, but they are liable to do so, and thus a habit may be formed that will do mischief. The Apostle Paul laid down the rule that we should do nothing whereby another might be led to offend. The associations of the theatre as at present conducted are so evil, that it is a grave responsibility to even inadvertently set an example of attendance.

Reader, N. B. 1. If a family is too poor to afford even some of the necessaries of life, does that fact exempt it from the duty of giving one-tenth of its earnings to the Lord's work. 2. Is the United States ten-cent note extinct or still in circulation.

1. The case is an extreme one. A family that could not afford even the "necessaries" of life would soon perish. If, however, it can afford the necessaries, and if it be a Christian family, it will give the Lord his share, and will prosper all the more on that account. It is not expected that any one will do impossibilities, but everyone "according to his means" as God hath prospered him. 2. Not now in circulation.

C. N. A., Norwalk, Conn. To whom shall I remit my annual subscription to the Bowery Mission?

In reply to the foregoing, and many similar inquiries, we would say: A number of our readers have undertaken to contribute "one dollar a year, and no more and no less," for the support of the Christian work of the Bowery Mission, with the understanding that they would renew their contributions annually. The year is now up, and in response to many inquiries, we beg to say that one dollar may be remitted by check, money-order or registered letter, and addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Student, Woolwich, Me. I was taught that the world was less than six thousand years old, but learned geologists teach that it may be millions of years old. Do they not contradict Scripture?

Scientists do not agree as to the age of the earth. That it is much more than six thousand years old is admitted by all, but how much is not known. If the soils and rocks were formed by a process as slow as that now prevailing, the age may run into the millions, but the process may have been more rapid in early ages. As the Bible does not state the time of creation, but merely says, "In the beginning," scientists do not contradict it on

"Oneida Community Quality."

Said a salesman, in the store that sells more silver-plated ware than any other in the country:

"When we have your ware in stock we can't sell anything else."

Because each piece of "Oneida Community Quality" Silverware possesses the originality, the art and the finish of the best "Sterling"; and it represents the truest economy.

The style and effect of the best "Sterling" is due largely to care in selecting the designs and outlines of the various pieces; also to the heavy ornaments and to the finish. Our Avalon pattern is the result of several years' careful study to reproduce these effects.

Each piece of Avalon ware has been given as much individuality as possible, while conforming to the general character of the design. The ornamentation is rich and deep and the pieces have all the effect of solid silver.

Again, in the Avalon pattern we have given unusual attention to the "finish." Especially in the new French gray effect, this charm of sterling silver has been faithfully reproduced in our products. The soft, dull gray of this finish, with its delicate shadings, brings out the full beauty of the Avalon design.

At the present price of silver the heaviest plate is the most economical. Triple-plate will wear three times as long as single. The additional cost of triple-plated ware over single is largely in the extra silver used. The present price of silver is so low that this is now only a small part of the manufacturing cost. "Oneida Community Quality" is made only in a plate heavier than triple (we call it "Triple-plus" and guarantee the wear for twenty-five years), and gives the consumer the full benefit of the reduction in the price of silver.

In other words, "Oneida Community Quality" "Triple-plus" plate is guaranteed for 25 years—a guarantee backed by our 26 years of practical experience in the manufacture of silverware—possesses the art and finish of the best "Sterling" and is sold for almost the price of ordinary plate.

Every piece of genuine Oneida Community silver bears a tiny stamp, which reads that point. Biblical scholars now believe the "days" of creation to have been not literal days, but long periods.

J. M. H. 1. What is the meaning of Christ's warning (Luke 11:24, 25) about the return of the evil spirit with seven companions to a man whose heart was swept and garnished? 2. What kind of sins are those described in I. Timothy 5: 24, 25 as going before and going after?

1 The corresponding passage Matt. 12:43-45, appears to indicate that primarily the meaning applied to the Jewish nation. It had repented or reformed under the preaching of the Baptist, "cleaned up," as the modern phrase has it, but had not gone on, as it should, to acceptance of Christ and righteousness toward God. The negative goodness was to be followed by a worse national condition in which the Lord would be crucified. It is as if a nation was led to forsake idols, but instead of becoming Christian, became atheistic. In the individual the reference is to a man weaned from some besetting sin, but not taking the grace of God into his heart, and replacing the love of sin with love of God and holiness, leaves the heart unoccupied, ready for a return of the sin he had quitted, or the fall into something still worse. 2. Paul was giving Timothy instructions for the government of the church. He was to be careful to appoint to office none but good men. But when he had reproved and reprimanded a member for open and manifest sin, which everyone would condemn, he must not think that all danger was past. There were other more subtle and secret sins, which would surely come to judgment though they were not known. Against these in himself and others Timothy was to be on his guard.

W. J. B., Horton, Kan. It is not necessary to sit in judgment on every one. If a man's work is of God, it will grow and prosper, despite all obstacles; if not, it will come to naught, no matter how ably it may be conducted. This is the way we regard the case in question. Remember the world is very apt to condemn whatsoever it does not understand.

L. G. H., Shingle House, Pa. What is the meaning of the word, "generation," in Matt. 24:34? Many generations have passed since Christ uttered those words, and yet the end has not come.

Two interpretations are suggested, either of which would explain the difficulty. One is that Christ had in his mind two horizons in this discourse—that of the destruction of Jerusalem and that of the end of the world. There may have been two discourses which the evangelist has combined. The words you quote evidently refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, as he distinctly said he did not know when the end of the world would be. The other suggestion is that the word "generation" should be translated, "nation." In that case, the survival of the Jewish peoples is a proof of the truth of his words. That nation will survive to the end of the world.

Subscriber, Albany, N. Y. 1. Absalom. 2. He was accounted the wisest of his day. 3. It is unusual for a single man to accompany a married lady to church, unless she is a relative; but it is not necessarily improper. To do so repeatedly would be apt to excite comment from people who are apt to be censorious.

C. J., Dows, Ia. I am always troubled with doubts of the future life. It may be wrong, but I cannot help it. I want to believe it implicitly, as I am getting an old man, and have buried many dear ones. Can you suggest any reading that would help my doubting nature?

We would advise you to procure a copy of the book: Proofs of Life After Death, by Prof. Robt. J. Thompson, 1604 Wellington Ave., Chicago; also The Witness to Immortality, by Geo. A. Gordon, published by Houghton Mifflin & Co.; The Hope of Immortality, by J. E. C. Welldon, published by Macmillan's; and The Unseen World, by John Fiske, published by Houghton Mifflin. Better than all these is the New Testament, which, throughout, assumes the fact of the future life as a certainty. It tells you that the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is not the God of the dead, but of the living, and that whosoever believeth on Christ, though he were dead, yet shall he live.

Mrs. M., Dayton, O. I was very much interested in your work among the Finns. Is there not some mission or evangelical work among the Finlanders in New York at the present time? I understand there are many there.

Yes. More than a year ago a group of about twenty-five Finlanders called Rev. Gustave Blomgren from Finland, to be their pastor in New York, and they are now worshiping here. The little flock has increased to about ninety faithful members. They are now endeavoring to raise money to build a mission chapel. One member, a servant girl, has offered all her savings ($300), and all the others are helping, but they are very poor. If you or any other reader wish to aid this little band of exiles to get a church home write to Pastor Blomgren, at No. 2137 Madison avenue, New York.

Her Last Words Were a Prayer

widely worshiped and loved. She was many-sided and versatile, and her average day's work would have worn out most women. To the rank and file of the Salvation Army she was the "dear little mother," to whom all hearts turned for counsel and encouragement. Her great experience in religious work, embracing three continents, had given her a wide power and influence in all the affairs of the Army. In the truest sense, it may be said that she gave her life to the work. To it she sacrificed all other ambitions and desires. No task was too hard, no journey too perilous, no burden too heavy, if only there were hearts to be lightened, lives to be brightened, and immortal souls to be won. During the years of her wonderfully busy life, she succeeded in drawing multitudes to the foot of the Cross. Of her, it may truthfully be said, that she was one of those "that turn many to righteousness," and who shall shine "as the stars for ever and ever."

Seven children, in the Booth-Tucker home at Mount Vernon, N. Y., mourn the loss of the mother who was known as the "good angel" by all the poor of the little Westchester County village. Six of these are Frederick (aged 13), Katherine (12), Flora (9), Lincoln (6), John Myron (2), and Muriel (5 months), besides Eva, an adopted child, whom Mrs Booth took up during one of her Western trips. The sad event of their mother's death has prostrated the family with grief. To Commander Booth-Tucker, the loss of his beloved wife and comrade is the severest blow of his life.

Characteristic of Mrs. Booth-Tucker was this last message from her pen, which was telegraphed from Holly, Col., to the Army in New York, only two days before her untimely death:

"Yesterday was one of the most precious Sundays of my life. Eager crowds gathered; rapt attention was given. The Holy Spirit was marvellously outpoured; conviction evidenced on every hand. Sinners—men, women and children—flocked to Jesus' feet, numbering forty-six for the day. Colonel Holland to the front as a flame of fire. Young converts and Colony veterans fought like heroes. All the county-seat stirred. Commander loyally remembered. Enthusiasm immense; prospects glorious. To God be all the praise!"

CONSUL.

Commander Booth-Tucker, who was in Chicago when his beloved wife passed away in distant Kansas, has received hundreds of telegrams of condolence and sympathy from all parts of the United States, Canada and Europe. To a message of sympathy from the Proprietor and Editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the Commander sent the following reply:

CHICAGO, Ill., Oct. 30.

"Dr. Louis Klopsch, Christian Herald, New York:

"Deeply grateful for your sympathy. Overwhelmed with agony, but seeking to walk with Christ in this furnace, and to bow in utmost submission to his will. 'The cup that my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?' 'What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter.'

"BOOTH-TUCKER."

On the arrival of the body at Chicago, it lay in state at Princess' Rink, West Madison street, where public services were held. It was then conveyed to New York.

"Force-thoughts"

By SUNNY JIM

IT'S the mood you wake up in that colors your whole day.

And this wouldn't matter so much if it wasn't to be such a very important day. You see, it's the only day you'll ever have to-day!

¶I think it would be a good thing if we were more polite to ourselves when we meet in the looking-glass of a morning. If you're on speaking terms with the person you see reflected there, the respectful thing to do would be to look at him and not at the part in his hair—and to ask how he feels and then pay attention to his answer.

¶If he's not feeling fit, ask him why and then prescribe for him.

¶But don't let him finish dressing thinking that he's got to go through another day without help or notice because you're so busy.

¶There are two of you, you know—two of everybody; yourself and the one in the glass, which is as near as you can get to seeing your other, silent and better self.

¶It's the man who has the help of both "himselfs" that finds work only half as hard, or rather does twice as much work and has time left to say,

"Be Sunny!"

¶And he can't do this unless he eats the food that helps. There's no way in the world to underpay your stomach and still keep it from going on strike.

¶Perhaps my book would help you—it's about "Force" and something else.

I wrote it myself.

Yours truly,

Sunny Jim

SIGHT-SINGING IN 12 LESSONS

Prepared Especially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD By B. C. UNSELD

LESSON IX.

Pitch—Relative and Absolute.—In lesson IV. we learned something about the highness or lowness of tones, or pitch. We must now study a little more deeply into that subject. There are two kinds of pitch, or rather two ways in which the pitch of a tone must be considered—two ways in which it must be named and represented. It must be named from its relation to other tones, and also independent of any relation.

20.—The relationship of tones in respect to pitch is called Relative Pitch. The fixed or independent position of tones is called Absolute Pitch.

21.—The relative pitch of tones is named by the syllables Do, Re, Mi, etc., and by the numeral names One, Two, Three, etc. The absolute pitch of tones is named by the names of letters, C, D, E, etc.

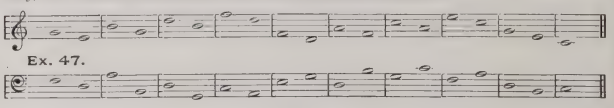
Illustration.—In convenient words, we may say the relative pitch of a tone is its position in a scale; this is described or named by a syllable or numeral. Its absolute pitch is its fixed position as determined by an instrument; this is designated by a letter. For example, the tone known on the instrument as A is named So or Five in the key of D, it is Mi or Three in key F, Do or One in key A, Re or Two in key G, and so on, but all the time, whether used in a key or not, it is known as A.

Representation of Pitch.—The pitch of tones is represented by the degrees of the staff. The staff may be used to represent relative pitch only, as in lesson III., but as commonly used, it aims also to represent absolute pitch. This is done by applying the names of absolute pitch to the degrees of the staff, attaching the letters to the lines and spaces.

The position of the letters upon the staff is fixed by a letter called a clef. A clef is a corrupted form of the letter from which it is named. The G clef is commonly placed upon the second line; the F clef is usually found on the fourth line. The position of the letters as fixed by the clefs is shown in example 45.

Ex. 45. Copy this example several times, looking at the printed copy; then try to copy it from memory.

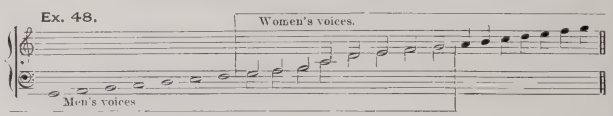
Ex. 46. Read these two exercises by letter, they are not to be sung. Read them repeatedly, daily, until the letters can be named in any order, forwards and backwards.



Ex. 47.

Voices.—The entire compass of the human voice, men's and women's combined, is about three octaves, as shown in example 48. The lowest octave belongs to the male voice, the highest octave to the female voice, the middle octave being common to both voices. The middle tone of this compass is called Middle C. It is a high tone in a man's voice, a low tone in a woman's. It is represented by the added line between the bass and treble staffs.

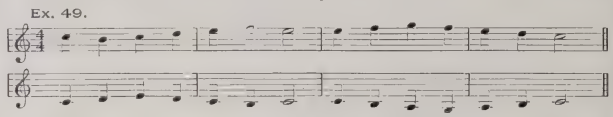
Ex. 48.



Voices are commonly divided into four classes, viz.: Bass, the low male voice; Tenor, the high male voice; Alto, low voice of women; Soprano, high voice of women.

You can tell by example 49 whether you can sing the higher or the lower tones more easily. If you can sing the higher range of tones easily you should sing soprano if a lady, and tenor if a gentleman. If your best tones are in the lower range you should sing alto, or bass, as the case may be.

Ex. 49.



Clefs and Voices.—You now can understand why the F clef is used for the bass voice, and the G clef for the soprano and alto voices. The F clef is also used for the tenor, as in church tune books, where the bass and tenor parts are written on the bass staff. When the tenor part is written on a separate staff, as in anthems, either the G clef or the C clef is used. The C or tenor clef is preferred in this country: it enables the tenor singer to find his part more readily, and it represents the real pitch of the voice. When a male voice sings from the G clef, the tones are an octave lower than written.

In your practice, you should study each part for practice in reading, but you should now give special attention to the part your voice is best suited for.

Tent Campaign in California Closed

EVANGELISTS Holdridge and Dickson have closed their tent campaign in California, after a most successful spiritual experience. The meetings began at Los Angeles in July, in the tent "Glad Tidings." There were numerous conversions. On August 23 work was begun at Long Beach, a famous pleasure resort. There were converts from all parts of the country. At the Long Beach services, much attention was given to Bible study. Major Hilton gave a series every afternoon for a week, drawing and holding large audiences.

All the churches of Fullerton, Cal., next united in an invitation, and work opened there on August 15. The tent was from the beginning well filled, and there were manifest evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit. Many heard the Gospel who had not been in attendance upon any church, and there have united with the church between forty and fifty persons. About an equal number came forward and expressed their determination to become Christians.

Holdridge and Dickson are now at Modesto, Cal.

Boyhood Days of Famous Divines

No. VI.—CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS

CHARLES SPURGEON, who was destined to become the most famous English preacher of his time, passed his boyhood in his grandfather's parsonage at Stambourne. It had eight windows in front, this parsonage, but four of them were plastered up and painted black, and then marked out in lines to imitate glass. The reason of this was that at that time there was a window-tax. So much was paid on every opening for the admission of light. The preacher's salary was so small that, out of economy, room after room of the parsonage was left in darkness, and came to be regarded by young Spurgeon's mind with reverent awe. Over other windows were put up boards, marked "dairy" or "cheese room," because by being labelled with these names, they would escape the tribute.

The hall floor of this parsonage was of brick, and carefully sprinkled with fresh sand. It was here that the future divine rode his rocking-horse. Many years later, when he was a famous preacher, and went back to Stambourne on a visit, an elderly man claimed to have rocked him on that hall floor when he was a boy. Spurgeon comments: "I remembered the horse, but not the man—so sadly do we forget the better and remember the baser." Then he musingly adds: "This is the only horse that I ever enjoyed riding. Living animals are too eccentric in their movements, and the law of gravitation usually draws me from my seat upon them to a lower level; therefore I am not an inveterate lover of horseback. I can, however, testify of my Stambourne steed, that it was a horse on which even a Member of Parliament might have retained his seat."

THE LATE CHARLES H. SPURGEON

Every Sunday morning the grandfather would sit in the best parlor and make his preparation for preaching. Charles was put in the same room with him, so as to make sure he would keep quiet. The Evangelical Magazine was given to him to help quiet him. It had one picture of a preacher on the front, and the picture of one mission station somewhere inside. The changing from one of these pictures to the other usually had the effect of making the boy sleepy. In any event, he did not dare to make a noise, because he was warned that if he did, grandpa would not be able to preach, and the poor people would not learn the way to heaven.

Spurgeon became very famous, in after years, for the daring with which he attempted anything which he thought he ought to do. In this the boy was father of the man. The story is told of one of the members of the church at Stambourne, named Roads, who was in the habit of frequenting the public-house, and spending the evening in drinking, greatly to the grief of his pastor, who often spoke in young Charles' hearing of his regret at the inconsistent conduct of this member of his church. Charles loved his grandfather very much, and became greatly exercised over the drunkenness of Mr. Roads. One day he suddenly exclaimed, in the hearing of the good old preacher, "I'll kill old Roads, that I will!" "Hush, hush! my dear," said the horrified grandsire, "you mustn't talk so; it's very wrong, you know, and you'll get taken up by the police if you do anything wrong." "I shall not do anything bad; but I'll kill him though, that I will." Well, the good grandfather was puzzled, but yet perfectly sure that the child would not do anything which he knew to be wrong, so he let it pass, merely muttering to himself that Charles was a strange child.

Not long after the boy's threat to kill Roads, Charles came into the family circle and astonished them all by saying, "I've killed old Roads; he'll never grieve my dear grandpa any more." "My dear child," said the old man, anxiously, "what have you done? Where have you been?" "I haven't been doing any harm, grandpa," said Charles, "I've been about the Lord's work, that's all."

Nothing more could be got out of the boy; but before long the mystery was cleared up. Mr. Roads called to see his pastor, and, with downcast looks and evident sorrow of heart, told the story of how he had been killed. "I am very sorry indeed, my dear pastor, to have caused you such grief and trouble. It was very wrong I know, but I always loved you, and wouldn't have done it, if I'd only thought." The old grandfather begged Roads to tell him what had brought about this repentance, and this was his story: "I was a-sitting in the public, just having my pipe and mug of beer, when that child comes in—to think an old man like me should be took to task, and reproved by a bit of a child like that! Well, he points at me with his finger, just so, and says, 'What doest thou here, Elijah?' Sitting with the ungodly; and you a member of a church, and breaking your pastor's heart. I'm ashamed of you! I wouldn't break my pastor's heart, I am sure.' And then he walks away. Well, I did feel angry; but I knew it was all true, and I was guilty; so I put down my pipe, and did not touch my beer, but hurried away to a lonely spot and cast myself down before the Lord, confessing my sin and begging forgiveness. And I do know and believe the Lord in mercy pardoned me, and now I have come to ask you to forgive me, and I'll never grieve you any more, my dear pastor." We may be sure that this greatly raised the lad in his grandfather's estimation.

When Spurgeon was a small boy, and went to a woman's school, he wanted one day a stick of slate-pencil, and had no money to buy it with. He was afraid of being scolded for losing his pencil so often, and so did not wish to ask at home. There was a little shop where nuts and tops, and cakes and balls and other things were sold by an old lady. Charles had seen other boys and girls get trusted by her. He argued with himself that Christmas was coming, and that somebody or other would be sure to give him a penny then, and perhaps even a whole silver sixpence. He decided, therefore, to go into debt for a stick of slate-pencil, and promised to pay at Christmas. He did not feel easy about it, but at last he screwed his courage up, and went into the shop. One farthing was the amount, and as he had never owed anything before, and his credit was good, the pencil was handed over by the kind old woman, and he was in debt. It did not please him much, and he felt that he had done wrong, but he did not know yet how much he was to suffer from it. Soon his father found out about it, and he gave him a long lecture. His ears were made to tingle, and he was badly frightened. He was marched off to the shop, crying bitterly all down the street, and feeling dreadfully ashamed, because he thought everybody knew he was in debt. The farthing was paid, amid many solemn warnings, and the poor debtor was set free, like a bird let out of a cage.

In the year 1844, the Rev. Mr. Knill, who was the great evangelist and soul-winner of his day, stayed for a few days at the Stambourne parsonage. One night he said to Charles: "Where do you sleep? For I want to call you up in the morning." Charles showed him his little room, and Mr. Knill took good note of it. At six o'clock the next morning he called him up. There stood in his grandfather's garden two arbors made of yew trees, cut into sugar-loaf fashion. The boy and the man went into one of these arbors. Mr. Knill knelt down in that arbor, and prayed for the boy with his arms about his neck. In the presence of all the family, Mr. Knill took Charles on his knee, and said: "This child will one day preach the Gospel, and he will preach it to great multitudes. I am persuaded that he will preach in the chapel of Rowland Hill, where I am now the minister." He spoke very solemnly, and called upon all present to witness what he said. Then he gave Charles a sixpence as a reward, if he would learn the hymn

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.

The boy was made to promise that, when he preached in Rowland Hill's chapel, that hymn should be sung. The years passed by. Sometime after Spurgeon had begun to preach in London, he was invited to preach to the children in Rowland Hill's chapel, and Cowper's hymn was sung, as Mr. Knill had predicted.

Reasons for Thanksgiving*

Thanksgiving for Spiritual Attainment as Well as Temporal Prosperity

WHAT a testimony that is that Solomon gave at the dedication of the Temple! "Not one word hath failed," he said, "of all the good promise, which He promised by the hand of Moses, his servant." How many Christians at the end of life with a survey of more and better promises than Moses was commissioned to make, have borne the same testimony! Christians are not promised the temporal prosperity, which was assured to the Old Testament saints, who were faithful in their lives; but they have the better assurance that in their afflictions they will have the sustaining strength of their Lord, and that all things will work together for good to them that love God. They have been promoted to a higher level, on which they do not look for immediate and tangible reward, but with better intelligence and stronger faith trust God in the darkness of trial, and are convinced that he is choosing their lot for them in the highest wisdom and love.

Thanksgiving day, in some homes, would be but an empty form, if merely temporal prosperity were all for which thanks should be rendered. But there are higher and better benefits than that. If we could look into the hearts alike of the rich and poor, we should find more discontent amid luxury, more real happiness in poverty, than we have any idea of. Our real wealth is measured, not by our pecuniary resources, but by our disposition and our personal qualities. We have reason to be thankful for the light that makes us able to endure. He is a richer man who is able to maintain his cheerfulness in adversity, than he who would be gloomy and miserable if he was stripped of his personal property. The true riches are within him, and even in a prison or a poorhouse he is able to rejoice. These are the men who really keep Thanksgiving—men who have learned in whatsoever state they are, to be therewith content. They are willing enough to improve their condition, and indeed will work hard to do so, but it is on higher mental and moral and spiritual attainments that their desires are set, and for the rest are willing to let it be as God wills.

The Star of Bethlehem

The "New light on the Star of Bethlehem," mentioned in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, should not be accepted seriously. Admitting that Kepler's mathematical demonstration is correct in every particular and that Aefele's findings are as reported, yet these things matter not, for "the wise men" of the time found that the star was west of their position at the time. If the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn would have taken place directly over Bethlehem, it would not have been possible for the wise men to determine if the stars were east, west, north or south of them, seeing the stars were so many millions of miles above their heads. The distance was too great to determine the angle. Later on—a few days, or a week, or more—when these planets were no more in conjunction, the wise men saw this star in another direction, even in the south. This time it moved toward the south, contrary to the direction that the planets take, for "it went," and "it came," and afterwards "it stood," showing that it moved for awhile and then became stationary.

Now when we note that this star "stood" over the very "house" where the babe was, how absurd the claim (of the scientists), that the Star of Bethlehem was but the maximum conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn is. Therefore there is no authority for saying "These details correspond closely with those of Matthew;" none for saying, "In fact, the agreement is surprising in its extent," for no two facts could well be more different. Hence our modern men of learning must admit that the Star of Bethlehem was a miraculous star, or they must prove the story a "myth."

Johnstown, Pa. JOHN HAMER.

Little School-maids in Brittany

THESE little Breton maidens were coming out of their provincial school in Finisterre when this little snapshot was taken by a traveling artist, into whose camera they looked with wondering, smiling eyes. They are used to the visits of strangers, who want to get their pictures on film or canvas. Very quaint and picturesque are the folk in Brittany, such odd bonnets they wear; and when they go to church Sunday, rain or shine, they carry an umbrella as badge of full dress—that is, Finisterre peasants do. In most little towns and villages, the public lavoir, or washing-place, where all the women bring the family wash on wash days, answers for a sort of social club. As they beat the clothes with paddles or swish them against stones, their tongues are quite as busy as their hands. The funeral that has been, the wedding or christening, furnish topics of converse; many a match is made there by managing mothers for little people not grown up, who may unmake all these plans when they come of age. At even, the Angelus rings—there are many mellow chimes in Brittanny—and the peasants, whether they be at work or play, stop, and bow their heads in prayer.

LITTLE SCHOOL-MAIDS IN BRITTANY

Her Dying Song of Triumph

HOW peaceful and consoling is the closing scene in the life of the true Christian. There is no fear, no apprehension, for no harm can befall one who is stepping across the river of death, upborne by the Saviour and clasping his hand all the way. Such a scene was that at the passing away of a young girl, Blanche Alice Starr.

Miss Starr was the daughter of Joseph W. and Mrs. Lettie Starr. She was born at Sigel, Jefferson county, Pa., December 31, 1882, and died at her home near Penfield, Pa., Sept. 29, 1903, at the age of 20.

Her religious experience was an unusual one. About seven years ago she was converted, and for some time enjoyed a wonderful experience. She made rapid progress in the spiritual life, and soon she felt called upon to minister to those who were in sin. Last March, her father was taken suddenly ill while at his brother's home in Woburn Run. Blanche, as a faithful daughter, came to assist in caring for him. She became very ill in consequence.

The closing hours of her life were luminous with happiness and victory. She knew that the end was near. Shortly before her death she called her friends to her side and bade them goodby, telling them not to weep, as she was going to be with Jesus. Then, in fullest joy and expectation, she sang the hymn:

Nearer, my God, to thee, nearer to thee,
E'en though it be a cross that raiseth me,

Then with a great peace shining in her face she passed away.

Her funeral took place at the mountain church on Toby, and was conducted by John Elder, evangelist, assisted by Wm. Kocher. The attendance was large and the services very impressive.

Mrs. Carrie Nation at the Bowery Mission

MRS. CARRIE NATION visited the Bowery Mission on a recent Sunday evening. There was an immense congregation, made up of the men who regard the Mission as their regular place of worship, and are found there every Sunday evening. They are the better class, men who live in the hotels and lodging-houses nearby; bright, sober, eager, intelligent, well-dressed, wage-earning men.

Mrs. Nation's presence was, to most of them, quite unexpected. The members of the Rescue League had been apprised of her intended visit, and were present in large numbers in the early prayer-meeting in the kitchen. Very few in the congregation had ever seen or heard this noted woman, and considerable curiosity, not to say concern, was manifested about her. When, however, she rose to speak and had uttered a few sentences, it was evident that whoever criticised and condemned her methods of dealing with the liquor traffic, the men of the Bowery realized that they were in the presence of one who sympathized with them, who loved them, and who was brave enough to die for them, if need be.

The responsive reading for the evening service had been the fifty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, "Ho every one that thirsteth, etc." This gave Mrs. Nation a text for a splendid Gospel talk—"God's Invitation versus the devil's Invitation," was her subject. On the one hand, everything is free, unfettered, unlimited; on the other, the devil says, "Come, but bring your money, your manhood, honor, family, and lay them at my feet."

Soon the subject of her special mission in life was reached—the liquor traffic. "A nameless horror," she called it. She had tried to find a name for it but could not. It was worse than anarchy, or treason, "for men," she said, "it is high treason against your mother, your wife and your little children. I have done smashing saloons now. I'm going after the cause. The man who sells rum is just as respectable as the man who votes for it. When an epidemic breaks out you don't blame the people who get it, you seek out the cause. Get right back to the voter. And I tell you, I feel I am a much better smasher than ever. Men, it is smash or be smashed. I am but a poor woman, the commonest of common women: but I have told God that I am willing to give up my life to him, if he will but use me in smashing this accursed thing. The Bible is full of stories about smashers. Moses, Gideon, Ehud, Samson, David, were all smashers. God uses insignificant people, and that's why he uses me."

And when this kindly, earnest, motherly woman finished speaking, there went up a shout of unanimous approval from the great crowd of Bowery men, nearly all of whom realized the truth of her assertion, "Men, I am fighting your battle."

Mrs. Nation stayed to the end of the after-meeting, speaking and praying with many poor drunkards, who will never forget her loving and encouraging words.

THE DRUNKARD'S HOPE

Christ Offers Full Deliverance From the Power of Drink

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IT is an awful but certain truth that "God is not mocked; for what a man soweth, that shall he also reap." "For he that soweth unto his own flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth unto the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap eternal life" (Gal. vi. 7, 8, R. V.). There is something unspeakably unrighteous in the policy of our so-called Christian Governments, which punish a man who is found in the streets "drunk and disorderly," and which nevertheless depends so largely upon the revenue which comes from intoxicating drinks, that the facilities to drink are everywhere close at hand to those who are easily tempted by them. The short-sightedness and utter unreasonableness of this policy is manifest in the fact that the enormous sums spent in making amends for this irreparable evil, in the building and upkeep of the prisons, lunatic asylums, and workhouses, which are thronged with the victims of drunkenness, must immensely deduct from the revenue obtained from drink. And when the amount of loss to the revenue, through the failure of their poor victims to pay the taxes, is added to the burden which they are upon the revenue, it may be found that without this revenue at all, and with only about a fourth of our poor-houses, lunatic asylums and prisons to maintain, our Protestant lands would be far more flourishing than they are now.

No reform can be made without sacrifice. If the poor drunkard turns from the drink, unless God especially comes to his aid, he will go through agonies with the terrible craving which comes upon him, and if, as Christian nations, we stand up to help our fallen brothers and sisters, we, too, must be ready to suffer loss. But did not Christ die for all for the very purpose that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them and rose again (II. Cor. 5: 15)? We cannot expect Governments, which, whether Protestant or Catholic, are Christian only in name, and not in principle or action, to act as they would do, if every member of the Government were guided by the Word of God.

From Governments, as they are at present, little help is to be expected for the poor lost enslaved drunkard. From himself he can have no expectation,—his temptation is stronger than he. It is easy to tell him that "wine is a mocker; strong drink is raging"; he knows it better than any other; he feels the chains which bind him. But either the devil lulls him into the manifest lie, that he can stop when he likes, and that he is fully master of himself, or, on the other hand, makes him believe that he has now gone too far, and there is no help for him: he has sown to the flesh, he has reaped corruption. "The drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" has been fulfilled in his experience; the haggard looks of his wife, the pining of his children for bread, drive him to despair; the devil makes him angry with them, and he madly rushes to the place where he may again take the poison which, at least, makes him forget for a time his miserable existence and theirs.

Where, then, is the help for the drunkard? With Him who when on earth pleased not himself; the only man who never in thought, word, or deed sowed to the flesh: never did a single thing just for his own self-satisfaction. He and he alone can help the poor drunkard. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke 19: 10). Because he, who alone could do it, took the drunkard's place upon the cross and personated him, adopting his sin and shame; because He bore on Him the iniquity of us all, and has made the drunkard's sin no exception from other men's sins, the poor lost drunkard can be saved; and more, can become a man who no more sows to the flesh. There is power in Christ to recreate such a man after his image and make him a new creature in Christ Jesus.

Driven to his doom, in agony, and yet seeking again that which causes all the misery—how piteous it is! And what can Christians do to help? God be praised for all which is being done for the drunkards, and God bless those who have given their lives to reclaim them.

The Law of Development*

A Reason for Thankfulness in the Wise Government of the World

REASONS for thankfulness there are in abundance, but it is not often that the one that the Psalmist dwells upon in the Psalm associated with the topic, is appreciated at its full value. He rejoices and calls upon his readers to rejoice that this is an ordered world, that it is not governed by caprice nor by a haphazard or unsympathetic method. There is more reason to be thankful for this than we always realize. We see good men suffering affliction, enduring poverty, unable to make their way in the world, thrown back by misfortune, and having to bear more than appears their share of the ills of life. On the other hand, bad men thrive, they succeed in their speculations, they escape misfortunes which fall upon their neighbors, and even in their evil designs which do mischief to the community, they often prosper. Seeing these things, the superficial observer doubts whether there is any wise and righteous power in control. The psalmist is convinced that there is, and having given his reasons for the conviction, he urges every one to be glad of it.

It would, indeed, be a weary, disappointing world, if there were nothing in it beyond what appears on the surface. But below all this confusion there is a law which will in the end make itself felt. "Our heart shall yet rejoice in Him, because we have trusted in his holy name." The time will come when we shall understand the wisdom of his plans, and see that in no other way could his ends have been achieved. In the meantime our duty is to trust Him and to wait patiently for the development of his plans. Like a boy at school, who would much rather play than study, who cannot understand why he should learn things that he does not expect to use, we are apt to become impatient under the process of education; but we know not yet what God's purposes for us are. The discipline and the training we are getting here are to fit us for those purposes, and when we are assured of that, we can bear them for the sake of the results. God will not waste the qualities which have been developed at the cost of our suffering.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society and Baptist Young People's Union for November 22, Psalm 33.

A Notable Florida Revival

Rev. Milford H. Lyon, the well-known evangelist, has been making an evangelical tour in the South this fall. Union meetings, that closed at West Palm Beach, Fla., are said to have been the most notable and fruitful revival ever seen on the Florida East coast. The membership of several of the churches will be nearly doubled. The revolution in public sentiment was so great that in the city elections just held the temperance forces gained an overwhelming victory. Mr. Lyon, with his singer Mr. Coultes, is now in union meetings at Daytona, Fla. They will return North soon, and begin a campaign at Downer's Grove, Ill.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

B. P., Mayodan, N. C. Do you think it wrong to commit suicide?

Assuredly it is wrong. God puts us here for a purpose. Life is a school, in which we are to prepare for a higher life and broader activities hereafter. The lessons may be hard, but we have no right to shirk them. If we put our trust in Him, he will enable us to overcome, and will smooth away all our troubles. Remember Job's answer to those who urged him to take his life: "All the days of my appointed time will I wait until my change come." We must be content to wait God's good time. Any other course is sin, and will assuredly meet with deserved punishment.

Mary N., Romulus, Mich. Should Russia maintain her claims in the East or not?

On moral grounds—no, she should not. Her policy is to annex and overrun contiguous territory until she gets an extensive seaboard. This policy has disrupted China, and is now menacing Korea and Japan. To pursue such a policy is to aggrandize Russia at the expense of weaker nations.

Inquirer, Oil City, Pa. According to the Bible, would you understand that it was right, or a necessity, to keep open all day Sunday and Sunday night, a restaurant, and thus deprive oneself of the means of grace that day?

Under ordinary circumstances, to keep the business open Sunday would be unnecessary and wicked, since it would deprive a number of persons of religious privileges on that day, besides desecrating the Lord's day by devoting it to labor. As we have frequently explained, the only labor that is justifiable on the Sabbath is that involved in works of necessity or of mercy. People must be fed, animals must be cared for, and the sick must be tended, etc. If a restaurant happened to be the only source of supply for the meals of a number of people, who would otherwise have to go without food, its proprietor would be justified in supplying that demand as far as it was an actual necessity, and no more. To open shop and cater to the general public for Sunday trade is wicked Sabbath-breaking. Prosperity coming from such a source, or from any wrong source, will not endure.

C. M., Olympia, Wash. I have been told that the Finns were nearly all anarchists. Is it so? If that be the case, they would be a bad class of immigrants to come here.

We are not aware of a single case of the kind, though we have met hundreds of Finns lately. They are, to all appearance, quiet, orderly, moral, law-abiding people. These are national characteristics, we believe.

This is an interesting letter from a reader in Michigan:

We are the longest married couple I know of around here. We are both natives of New York State, my wife and I. The year of my birth was 1818; my wife is one year younger. We were married on August 27, 1840, and two years before this time we became members of the Congregational Church, and have remained members up to the present time. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I think is the best of all for me, and I believe it is the paper that the millions should subscribe for. As a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I find myself in the best of company, and in the best family of the land. One ought to be proud to belong to so large a party, which does not close its ear to the cry of the needy, but is ready to help at all times. I had three brothers, and not one of them ever used whisky or tobacco. Two of us are yet alive, a brother (83), and myself (85), and one other lived to see 84 years.

Mrs. Mary A. Thompson, Phœnix, Ariz., writes:

I put in a plea for a mission in Phœniz, Ariz., for the poor miners. May we become co-workers with Christ by reaching down into the depths for the precious pearls of humanity and seeking to bring them up into the sunshine of God's love.

Miss A. S. Sherburn, Minn. 1. Is a person who does not believe in the Bible allowed to become President of the U. S., or to hold any office? 2. Are not most of the professors of universities Christians? 3. Is there any offices an unbeliever can not hold, if so what are they? 4. Is there any State in the U. S. in which women can vote for presidential electors, if so, which?

1. No religious qualification is necessary to hold public office. 2. Unquestionably. Nearly all are orthodox believers. Some who were not so, were, in several instances, asked to resign, their teaching being considered objectionable. 3 Yes, the offices of Congressional, Army and Navy Chaplains. 4. Full suffrage has been granted to women in Wyoming, Colorado, Idaho and Utah.

L. J., Upper Tract, W. Va. 1. I have been reading of the Panama Canal in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. To whom shall I write to secure information concerning the engineering work? 2. How is the climate for white men?

1. No work is being done on the canal at the present time, and months will probably elapse before work can be resumed. 2. The climate is deadly to whites. The country along the line of "the big ditch" is one of the unhealthiest in the world, on account of the malaria and fevers.

Subscriber, Dickens, Ia. 1. The lines are from The Ancient Mariner, by Coleridge. 2. Different stages of development and differences in soil and sunshine cause differences in the hues of the fruit. 3. No Chinese admitted except in such cases as are officially approved. 4. The Iowa Senators are Wm. B. Allison and Jonathan P. Dolliver. 5. Write to Hubert P. Main, 135 Fifth avenue, New York. 6. Fishes rest and presumably sleep. 7. Moral or spiritual literature is profitable for Sunday reading. We would not include romances in this category.

G. F., Broken Straw, N. Y. Six per cent, is the legal rate.

A. B. G., Bridgeport, Conn. Meon is the name of an herb. It was also the name of a plain (see Judges 9:37).

Louise M., Bordentown, N. J. We lose no opportunity of doing so. We regard the liquor traffic as the nation's curse, and believe it to be the duty of the Church, and of all Christian men and women, to fight it at all times.

Leo B., Jamestown, Pa. Bishop Hartzell's work in Africa includes the "redemption" of little native boys and girls, who are then trained at the mission stations under Christian auspices. For full information, write to Rev. E. H. Richards, Norwalk, O.

Interested Reader, Reno, O. The Pitman system is the clearest, the most easily read, and the most widely used in the business and professional world.

Will Warren L. Dull and John A. Dull (or Duhl) send their addresses to E. C. Dull, Winston, Salem, N. C.?

A. E. R., Trenton, N. J. They have one in New York. Address Secretary, Young Women's Christian Association, New York City.

A. D. S., Northfield, Minn. Football as played by college teams seems to us to be brutal. It is not an athletic contest, but a fierce and frequently a sanguinary riot.

Mrs. M. E. O., Fairhope, Ala. It is a matter for the individual conscience. Of itself, the game is innocent enough, but it might be played amid surroundings that make it harmful.

Reader, Fairbury, Ill. The figures were very likely a typographical error. Should probably have been 320. We do not for a moment believe any one purposely misstated the facts.

CROWDS AT THE FUNERAL OF MRS. BOOTH-TUCKER, AT WOODLAWN, N. Y.

Seldom has a larger or more sympathetic audience been seen at a funeral service, than that which filled Carnegie Hall, New York, on Sunday, November 1, on the occasion of the memorial service in honor of the late Mrs. Booth-Tucker, who was killed in a railroad accident on the Santa Fe road. Five thousand persons packed the hall, while nearly ten thousand waited outside during the entire service, unable to obtain admission. The interment took place in the family plot at Woodlawn. The services at the grave were witnessed by an immense multitude, which joined reverently in the last tributes to the beloved Salvation Army leader.

A Story That Will Never Die

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS! Who can measure the length and breadth, the depth and height of the blessed influence which this great work of John Bunyan, the Bedford tinker, has exerted on Christian life, thought and activity? Once begun, it is so entrancing that it must be finished; and, once read, it is never forgotten. Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps, says in his introduction to this Presentation Edition:

"The first book I can remember, next the Bible, is Pilgrim's Progress. It was read aloud to me by my mother on Sunday afternoons, when I was eight years old. The vivid impression made on my mind by that reading will never be effaced. The characters of the story were as real to me as my own schoolmates. My own father was not more clearly an actual being than Christian or Faithful.

"The charm of this old religious classic is a charm that comparatively few of the youth of this generation know anything about. In the constantly increasing stream of publications, especially fiction, some of the few really immortal books of the world have been swept down into the current and lost to view."

The pictures in this Red Line Holiday Edition are simply unequaled. They follow the text, page by page, and bring to the eye, with never-to-be-forgotten pertinency, the characters depicted by Bunyan in his inimitable style. Of course, this is not a new work, but as the late Dr. Talmage often remarked, "a good old sermon is better than a poor new one;" so a good old book is better than a poor new one.

Pilgrim's Progress is imperishable. If you have not already read it, read it now. You never have read anything that will please you more. The best novels of our time cannot compare with it, in intensity of interest. You will be delighted, charmed and edified. And then it is so beautiful as a specimen of modern bookmaking. Every page of the text surrounded by a red line; every one of its hundred-and-one pictures specially drawn and engraved for it, while the binding is simply exquisite, in real vellum de luxe cloth, with genuine gold stamp. It contains 428 large pages, measures, when open, 9x15 inches, weighs nearly three pounds, and is sent, all charges prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, at only $2. Never was better value given for the money.

IN THE "HOLY CITY" OF AMECAMECA

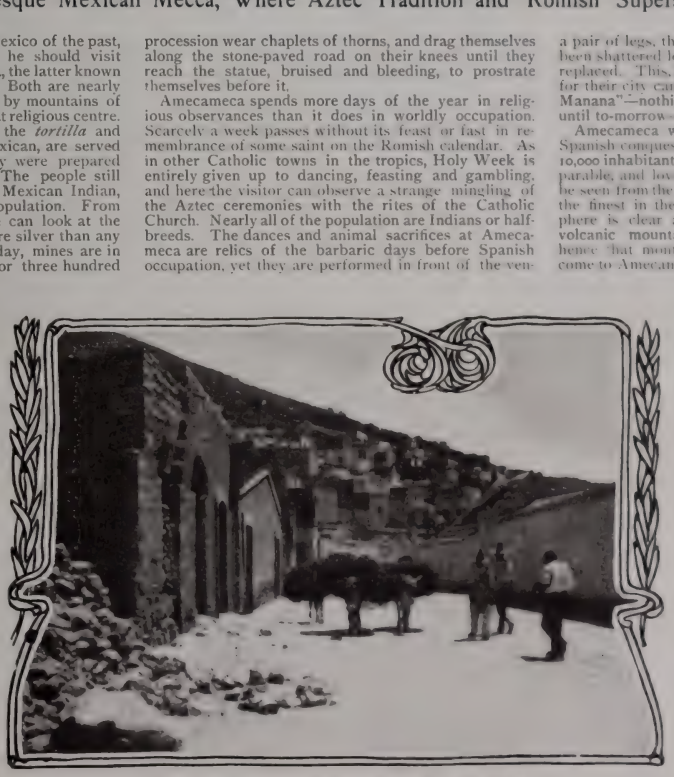
A Strange and Picturesque Mexican Mecca, Where Aztec Tradition and Romish Superstition Have Full Sway

F one would see a picture of the Mexico of the past, but little altered by centuries, he should visit either Guanajuato, or Amecameca, the latter known even to-day as the "Holy City." Both are nearly e centuries old. One is surrounded by mountains of ecious metal, while the other is a great religious centre. In the market-place of Guanajuato the tortilla and ijole, the national dishes of the Mexican, are served tourists in the way in which they were prepared the ancient Aztecs themselves. The people still ng to the picturesque garb of the Mexican Indian, d this race comprises most of the population. From e public square of Guanajuato, one can look at the ountain sides which have yielded more silver than any her portion of Mother Earth. To-day, mines are in istence which have been worked for three hundred ars, and are apparently inexhaustible.

Nearly every one in Guanajuato—even the humblest peon—ts his living from the depths the earth. Women as well men work in the valleys and nnels, some of which stretch ck miles into the mountains, d a common sight in the narw streets is the train of mules, rrying a pack-load worth a all fortune. Yet, in spite of e wealth surrounding it, the ty is one of the most povertyicken in appearance which e traveler can find. Few of e public buildings are worthy the name. The only strucres of note are the churches. uanajuato is truly an illustran of the fact that riches do t always bring comfort or ppiness, for the people themlves are among the most misable of the peon class.

Amecameca is not only the rine of one of the most noted ints in the Mexican calendar, t here is enacted yearly a Pason Play, which is as thrilling its realism as that of Obermmergau, although the actors ay not be as elaborately robed, d the scenery is confined to a ckground of rocks and trees. o one knows when or how the ay originated here, but there is no doubt that it has en carried on for centuries. Tradition has it that ray Martin, a Mexican padre, while living in a cave the "Sacre Monte," at the foot of the volcanic Popotepetl, devoted his life to good works and miraculusly averted an eruption of the volcano. Thousands superstitious townsfolk yearly climb the mountain ad which leads to the cave, near which stands the age of the padre. Some of the penitents in the procession wear chaplets of thorns, and drag themselves along the stone-paved road on their knees until they reach the statue, bruised and bleeding, to prostrate themselves before it.

Amecameca spends more days of the year in religious observances than it does in worldly occupation. Scarcely a week passes without its feast or fast in remembrance of some saint on the Romish calendar. As in other Catholic towns in the tropics, Holy Week is entirely given up to dancing, feasting and gambling, and here the visitor can observe a strange mingling of the Aztec ceremonies with the rites of the Catholic Church. Nearly all of the population are Indians or half-breeds. The dances and animal sacrifices at Amecameca are relics of the barbaric days before Spanish occupation, yet they are performed in front of the venerable church of St. Sebastian, by those who have just been blest by its priests at mass.



ON THE ROAD TO THE "HOLY CITY" OF AMECAMECA

It is doubtful if in any other part of Mexico the buildings are more dilapidated. Even the principal church, that of St. Sebastian, has been sadly neglected. Earthquakes have fissured its walls and roof, while the once rich decorations of the interior are frayed and faded. Above the main entrance was once a mammoth statue of Sebastian, but now the visitor sees only a pair of legs, the body from the knees upward having been shattered long ago by an earthquake and never replaced. This, however, is characteristic of the people, for their city can be called the capital of "the land of Manana"—nothing is done to-day which can be put off until to-morrow—if it is not a celebration of some sort.

Amecameca was a city of distinction before the Spanish conquest. It has at the present time less than 10,000 inhabitants. Its picturesque features are incomparable, and lovers of nature go here that the views to be seen from the terraces of the Sacre Monte are among the finest in the whole world. In January the atmosphere is clear and stimulating and the panorama of volcanic mountain-peaks is undiscovered by clouds; hence that month is the favored time for visitors to come to Amecameca. It is said that the body of Fray Martin (who died and was buried at Tlalmanalco) was secretly removed to the darkness in the cave on the Sacre Monte—a little hill covered with a thick growth of trees—and that he hopes still be there, undisturbed amid all the changes to which the land has been subjected. One of the curious superstitions, dating back almost to time immemorial, is for pilgrims to the "holy hill" to leave there some part of their possessions for "good luck." They usually tear a rag from their dress, or a few hairs from their head, and fasten these to the trees on the Sacre Monte.

Tourists and mountain climbers, who wish to venture upon the slopes of Popocatepetl, the great volcano, Amecameca usually choose as their starting point. Here they are supplied with guides, horses and mules for the journey. They find little difficulty in procuring a written permit for the purpose; this, however, is necessary, as the mountain is owned by the religious works. The guides make the ascent on horseback to the snow line and there proceed on foot. On reaching the crater, they descend into it by a basket and windlass used by the volcano gatherers. The whole journey and the return to Amecameca usually occupy two days. Warm clothing, including woolen gloves, comfortable swathings for the feet, thick hats or caps to protect from cold at night renders half-spectacles essential ground to save the eyes from the blinding glare of the snow and an abundance of nourishing food—these are the necessities for those who would make the ascent. It is a most exhausting experience, and the walk around through the snow is one that calls for sound heart and sturdy physique

SMALL ESSENTIALS

TEXT—ZECHARIAH 4: 10:

Who hath despised the day of small things?

THE world's favorite monocle is the telescope. We admire objects for many different reasons: One of the chief is their bigness. Every tourist wants to see Niagara Falls. It is the biggest of all Falls. And Mount Everest. It is the highest of all mountains. And Kilauea, because that volcano has the largest crater in the world. We would ascend the Eiffel Tower. It is higher than any other tower; and we would circle the Ferris Wheel, because it is larger than any of the other wheels. The human race, conscious that it is finite, aspires to explore the infinite. Its conception of the sublime is not the dwarf, but the giant.

But though tremendous bulk, or magnitude, or hugeness, or immensity, has for the human eye an awe-inspiring fascination, yet to-day I want to point out some seeming insignificances which are more essential for the world's peace and harmony than was the Colossus of Rhodes, or the hanging gardens of Babylon, or the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or the Palace of Cyrus, cemented with gold, or any of the other Seven Wonders of the world. I find that though my watch has its large wheels, and bars, and regulating hand, and mainspring, and adamantine jewels, yet it has also its little screws, and little wheels, and little cogs, and little pegs, which the jeweler has to study under the clarifying eye of the magnifying glass. I also find that the absence, perhaps, of one of these little screws or cogs, might stop the whole machinery of my watch, as surely as if I should snap the mainspring.

Seeming insignificances may be vital essentials. Some years ago, when crossing the Atlantic Ocean, the companion with whom I was traveling, one day suddenly flung open my stateroom door and cried, "Come on deck. Something has happened to the ship." When I arrived on deck, I found scores and hundreds of passengers excitedly watching the strange movements of the ship's course. Instead of ploughing ahead, we were slowly moving around to the right in a perfect circle. Just then an officer passed me, and I asked, "What is the matter, Lieutenant? Is the rudder broken?" "Oh, no," said he. "We are merely testing a new compass. In order to find out whether it is perfect, we had to wait until we were far away from the magnetic effect of rocks and land. Those influences may not seem to be much, but they may entirely deflect the accuracy of the compass' needle." Many years ago, a large ship was wrecked, because a small piece of steel from the point of a knife was driven into the wood near its compass-box, and made the compass' finger a false guide.

Prolific Faults

Thus, my friends, I would take for my theme to-day, the "Small Essentials" of life. I would try to show you that many of the seeming insignificances, and the despised monads are pregnant with large broods of influences, every one of which will have large progenies. A cholera germ may be so small that it is not visible to the naked eye. If, however, it is let alone in its work of devastation, it can soon crowd the wards of the county hospital with invalids, and keep the undertakers' wagons busy by day, as well as the nurses busy by night. I ask the striking question which Zechariah put in times of old, "Who hath despised the day of small things?"

Small essential the first: Appropriateness and neatness of personal apparel. Appropriateness and neatness in reference to the coat a man wears upon his back, and to the shoes on his feet, and especially in reference to the cleanliness of the linen he wears about his neck, and to the modesty with which he is attired in public. God would never have condemned the "cauls and the chains, and the bracelets, and the ruffles and bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs and the headbands, and the tablets, and the earrings and the nose-jewels, and the changeable suits of apparel, and the mantles, and the wimples and the crisping pins, and the glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoods and the veils" of the haughty daughters of Zion, "who walk with stretched forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet," unless there was a direct connection between a man's inner character and his "Sartor Resartus," or "Philosophy of Clothes." Paul would never have commanded the women of the Corinthian church to veil themselves in public assemblage, if he had not been convinced that a woman's disregard of the social customs of the country and the time, implied a lack of modesty and purity. There is,—there must be, an unbreakable, spiritual link binding a man's personal apparel and his heart. "Cleanliness is next to godliness" is a trenchant statement not found in Holy Writ; but the substance of its teachings is certainly found within the leaves of the Holy Bible. The elaborate directions which God gave to the Israelites for careful and frequent ablutions of the body and the clothes, show that he is not indifferent to the cleanliness of those who come into his presence. We have, therefore, a right to doubt whether a person who is in public chronically dirty in person, or slovenly or immodest in apparel, can offer acceptable worship.

Yet, to hear some slovens talk, one might suppose it was a sign of mental degeneracy for men and women to be careful of their personal appearance. They pretend to believe that a well groomed and neat man is essentially a weak man. Therefore they practically say that one of the signs of genius is a disregard of the decencies of life. They cite the example of the Greek mathematician whose appearance in deshabille on the streets shocked all the people who saw him, and the example of Napoleon, and Samuel Johnson, and Horace Greeley, all notorious for their indifference to ordinary neatness of attire; but such examples are not proofs of genius, but only of the power of genius to win its way in life, in spite of disgusting habits. The genius of Alexander Dumas triumphed in spite of the degradation of his birth, and Henry Fawcett became a statesman and successful administrator in spite of his blindness, so, personal may fail to defeat the true genius, but they can never help him to victory. And yet, deluded by this idea that slovenliness and uncleanliness are signs of true greatness, many a lawyer, a doctor, a merchant has ruined his financial chances in life because he would not dress as a gentleman should dress. There are more ways than one of interpreting that passage of Scripture which says in reference to the one-talent man: "And I was afraid and went and hid thy talent in the earth." Some of "the earth" in which many men hide their talents of life is to be found in the filthiness and in the unkempt conditions of their wardrobes.

If it is necessary to be clean and neat in personal apparel in temporal work, how much more is this neatness essential when we are consecrating our lives to the service of Jesus Christ? The dear Saviour wants us to go out and labor in his name, in the same way as he used to work. He was taunted with many reproaches during his earthly life, but those who hated him most never charged him with uncleanliness or slovenliness; and we may be sure that the Pharisee who invited him to his house, and the other hosts who entertained him, would never have welcomed him as a guest, if he had been careless about his person or his dress. The quality of his robe may have been poor, but we may be sure that there were no impurities upon it or upon him. So, Christian workers, if we go forth in Christ's name, some of us must be more careful about our personal appearance. Remember, O minister, when you ascend the pulpit, that your clothes may not be expensive, but they should be neat. Remember, O Sunday School teacher, that when you expound the Bible lesson, your scholars are learning from you what it is to be a Christian. They are learning with their eyes, as well as with their ears. Remember, O man of God, that wherever you go, your clean skin and pure linen, as well as your lips, preach in Christ's name.

Kindness and Courtesy

Small essential the next: The little kindnesses and courtesies which we should extend to those with whom we come in daily contact. The little acts of deference which we should show to ladies, such as taking off the hat when we stand with them in an elevator, or allowing them to precede us through an opened door. The "Thank you, sir," with which a lady should acknowledge a gentleman's action when he rises in a street car to offer her a seat. The little social calls by which we should welcome a new neighbor or her friends into our community. The little gifts of delicacies which should be sent to the invalid's room of our neighbor's house. All these little attentions and courtesies may not seem to be of much value at the time; but they are mighty in the development or the depletion of human character. They are mighty in deciding whether a man is to live a selfish or an unselfish life.

How a selfish life? Simply enough. Here, for instance, is a man who enters a railroad car. He places his satchel in one seat and his overcoat by his side. Then he stretches out his long legs, puts his feet upon the opposite seat and begins to read a newspaper. After awhile, the train fills up, but he does not remove his encumbrances. The man is an incarnation of selfishness. He cares only for his own comfort, and is oblivious of the rights of others. He has paid for but one sitting. He has a right to occupy only half a seat. Yet, he is monopolizing four sittings. When the poor old woman with a heavy bundle comes down the aisle, timidly looking for a place to rest and to deposit her load, he buries his face yet further in the newspaper and pretends not to see her. The old lady hesitates a little by his side, and then passes on. You say, "Th man is not a polite man! He is not a gentleman." say Christian courtesy means more than the two wor "mere politeness" imply. That man is laying t foundations of an evil future. For, if he is discourteo to his fellow men, if he is willing to crowd his fello passengers in a railroad train out of the seats whi rightfully belong to them, he is developing a dispositi which, if not checked, may lead him by-and-bye defraud his neighbor of the dollars and cents which right belong to him. When Paul said, "Be courteou he meant more than to be merely polite. He mea "be honest, be fair, be noble in the little duties a attentions which you should show to your fellow-me

Development of Character

Character is not born, it is developed. It springs n up in a night, as a Jonah's gourd. It grows gradual Lyman Beecher once said, "It took forty years," wh some one asked him the question: "How long did take to write that sermon?" By that, Mr. Beech meant that every year's work was a preparation for t following year's work. Every act of our present day dependent, in more ways than one, upon the actions our past. When a woman peeks out of her window see the furniture van unload her new neighbor's furn ture, and then refuses to call upon that neighbor, a extend to her the rightful social respect of the neig borhood, she is schooling herself to refuse to extend welcoming hand to her humble sister when she ente her church. When a man is willing to push his w through the crowds, blocking the aisles of a large dr goods store, forcing frail women to right and left, a shoving aside the little children, he is nurturing t spirit which is shown by a criminal chauffeur, wh drives his automobile at frightful velocity through th crowded streets of a large city. He drives it ahea caring not what horses he may frighten, or what perso he may strike, because he knows that like a full-speede Cunarder striking a fishing smack, it is the other perso who will be hurt and not himself. Christian courtesy of the tree of righteousness, and discourtesy is of t tree of sin. Let us beware how we ignore that apostol commandment, "Be courteous." (I. Peter 3: 8.)

Furthermore, my brother, remember that discourtes toward others almost invariably has a reactiona effect. The person who complains most about th rudeness of others is generally the one who himself rudest of all. Some time ago, I was riding in a Pitt burg street car. An aged colored man entered. H hair was as white as was that of Frederick Douglas just before his death. The car started ahead an nearly flung the old man upon his face. I rose an beckoned to him to come and take my seat. All th way down the aisle he kept grumbling and grumblin Even after he was seated, he kept on complainin about the people "not being willing to give an old ma a seat." At last I lost my patience. I leaned forwar and said: "Friend, these passengers may have don wrong in not arising to give you a seat. They ma have been impolite and discourteous. But did yo ever stop to think that you yourself were even more di courteous than they? When I rose to give you m seat, you were not enough of a gentleman to say 'Thank you' for it." So everywhere we can find th the people who most complain about the discourtes of others, are apt, like the old black man, to be jus as discourteous themselves. If there is this sin-breed ing mote of impoliteness in the eyes of our brother let us be sure that we have not the larger sinful bear in our own.

Influence of Example

Small essential the next: The abstinence from a appearance of evil. The taking care of your life's ac tions, so that they may never be false lights luring you neighbors and friends upon the fatal rocks of sin. Th refusal to eat meat, if by the eating you may caus your brother to offend. "All things may be lawful, bu all things are not expedient," was the substance of th Pauline injunction to the Corinthian church. "To seem may sometimes be almost as great a sin as "to be. Mark you this: No man can afford in any way to hav his influence cast upon the wrong side of any mora question. Nearly all our great religious teachers hav recognized this truth.

We must abstain from all appearance of evil o account of our influence over others. We must ab stain from all appearances of evil on account also o the reactionary evil influence upon ourselves. One o the greatest bulwarks against sin is the God-implante desire to be thought well of by your neighbors. A man, on account of principle, ought to be ready, i

NOW SIX CHURCHES ON WHEELS

SEVERAL years ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD printed an account of the beginning of chapel car work by the American Baptist Society, the object of which was to carry the Gospel to obscure communities along new lines of rail. Since the first car sped on its mission of mercy — literally the first church on wheels—other cars have been added, until to-day there are six of these traveling tabernacles in various parts of the country, viz., the "Evangel," the "Emmanuel," the "Glad Tidings," "Good Will," "Messenger of Peace," and "Herald of Hope." They are all under the direction of the American Baptist Publication Society of Philadelphia, one of the missionary organizations of the Baptist denomination.

The chapel car, with all of its appointments, combining chapel for worship, parsonage for the missionary and his assistant, organ, singing books, Bibles, etc., is the conception of the Rev. Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Philadelphia. Impressed with the need of missionary work, while riding with his brother, Mr. Colgate Hoyt, of New York, in his private car, through Northern Wisconsin and Minnesota, Dr. Hoyt, the minister, remarked to his companion that the railroad men ought to be doing more for the country than they were doing.

"Just look at these towns through which we have been rolling all day," he went on. "Do you not see, in all these little places, from one to five saloons, and not a place of worship in scores of them? Why not build a missionary car of some kind to give these lonely and destitute communities an opportunity of hearing the Gospel message." This was the germ of the idea. The railroads give the chapel car free transportation, and are glad to have them stop and hold religious services along their lines. The "church on wheels" is side-tracked wherever the directors of the work in Philadelphia order it. The track chosen is usually one at a small town, where churches are almost unknown. The people are attracted at once, and invitations to attend services in the car are accepted by as many as can crowd in. If the church on wheels proves too small to hold the congregation, as it generally does, the platform is used as a pulpit, and the audience gathers around in the open space outside the track. When converts are made they are baptized on the spot. It is not possible to have a regular baptistry on the train; so if there is no river near by, the baptistry is improvised by some of the men of the town being set to work to dig a cistern just outside the car. When finished, it is filled with water, and the missionary baptizes the converts.

CHILDREN GATHERING FOR A SERVICE IN THE CHAPEL CAR

If the converts made by the railroad missionaries are sufficient in number to form a community of themselves, they are organized into a church, a building is secured, a missionary appointed for permanent work, and the church on wheels is hitched on to the end of the next train and travels to another centre leaving behind a settled society that in time will rise to the dignity of a church building and a special pastor of its own.

The workers live in the car. One of the missionaries described the experience in this way: "The car is seventy-five feet long and is church and parsonage all in one. The chapel is well furnished with Bibles, song books, maps, charts, tracts, and a splendid little organ, a blackboard, colored crayon for the illustrated talks, and all our tools for convenience. The chapel will seat about one hundred and twenty-five, but I have had as many as one hundred and fifty-eight children present at the children's meetings. Leaving the chapel and going through a swing-door near back of the pulpit and organ you come to our living rooms. We have a combination room, I suppose you might call it. There is an upper and lower berth, as on a palace sleeper, a nice library of books and a roller-top desk occupy another corner. Two large mirrors adorn the walls. There are books for hanging things. The dining table is put up in each room for each meal—a folding table, something like those used on rug plat sleepers. Going out of this room, say, two feet space, there is a hall through to the back door. On one side of this hall is a little room, a doll house you would think, but it is my kitchen. Just standing room, fitted up with an ice box, cupboard, and a good range, the missionaries cook and eat same as other folks do."

Such is life in the church on wheels. May they multiply and continue to do good work in the needed spiritual field where they are now serving. A hundred such churches on wheels could be used in churchless and neglected localities.

necessary, to defy the scorn, and the sneer, and the opprobrium, and the persecution, and the misrepresentation, and the ridicule of the human race. But every man may desire that his neighbors and friends think well of him; that they should regard his name as the synonym of honesty, and truth, and probity, and rectitude. And when any man comes to the dangerous condition in which he does not care what his neighbors think about him; when he intentionally and recklessly stirs up a hornet's nest of needless criticism; when he cruntingly boasts that it does not matter what others may say, as long as he is not doing wrong, then that man's feet are treading the soft quicksands of temptation, and walking along the narrow edge of the precipice of death.

My sister, be careful about the character of your associates. My brother, you who are an officer or a member of the Christian church, I would not attend the theatre again. You may say you saw nothing wrong. You may say you need the relaxation. But you can find that relaxation in some other way. You cannot afford the risk. Young man, I would take down that semi-nude picture from your wall. You may say it causes no evil thought in your mind. You may argue that the nude in art is just as essential for true beauty as the nude in the dissecting room is essential for the development of surgery. But you cannot afford the risk. Abstain from all appearances of evil. Perhaps you think this my own personal thought. It is not. Read I. Thess. 5: 22: "Abstain from all appearance of evil." It is the apostolic command.

Small essential the last. The inexorable duty of keeping an engagement. The necessity of doing what you promise to do. If you say to a friend, "I will meet you at such and such a place, at such and such a time," you should be there. You should be there just as certainly as you would be down at the ship's dock on time when it is about to sail for Europe, and when you have purchased a $100 berth for the passage. If you cannot be on time, according to promise, for your engagement, then you should notify the person with whom you have the appointment. But the great trouble with many people is that they have no moral sense of the duty of keeping an engagement unless they wish to do so. They will promise anything, like a dishonest politician just before an election: and like the same dishonest politician after election they will forget all their promises, if it suits their convenience to forget. The result is that the man's character and religious life will be eaten out by these little failures and sins, just as one little worm can tunnel its way into the heart of a great oak and eat out its heart, until at last the monarch of the forest will have its backbone snapped by the onrushing winds.

It is the foxes, the little foxes, that most often spoil the tender vines—not the elephantine monsters. Once in a while, however, the heavy foot of an Eastern camel might crush them, or the paw of a leopard might rip them apart, when the midnight prowler, chased by the dogs, is rushing away after having robbed the sheepfold: but this is a rare occurrence. It is the little faults, the careless and thoughtless neglects, which do the most frequent mischief. It is the little words that destroy the gardens, and with their fairest flowers of thorns stab the flowers to death—not the mighty growths of the cedars of Lebanon or of the weeping willows. So it is inevitably the small sins, the despised sins, the ignored sins, the sins of insignificance. Our most frequently overthrown human structures are not the behemoth sins, not the monstrous sins as are the sins catalogued in the criminal codes of men and of nations.

Therefore, O man, I beg and plead with you that you take Christ into the smallest details of your life. Let the Christ be with you as much in the paying down of a borrowed five-cent piece as in the purchase of a note. Let him be with you as much in the fastenings of your wardrobe as in the cleanliness of your tongue. Let him help you in the Christian experience which you extend to your neighbors, as well as in the Christian ministrations you offer in your church. May you live and serve always be able to make the prayer, "Thou hast been in the little temptations, and thou I know that thou wilt make me able to bear the greater trials." Was such a lesson as this for consecration ever more timely than when there are those who will dare "to despise the day of small things?"

The Enlargement of Our National Forum

THE men who assemble at Washington each year to make the laws for the nation will shortly find at their disposal much more room than at present. To any person, who has visited that immense building, the United States Capitol, with its hundreds upon hundreds of rooms, it might appear improbable that any additional space should be needed in which to transact the business of the legislative branch of Uncle Sam's government; but for several years past Congress has been calling for larger quarters. This demand for larger working quarters is no new thing in our history, either. When the Capitol building at Washington was completed in 1830, in accordance with the ideas of George Washington, it was thought that it would meet all the future needs of the country, but twenty years had not rolled round ere additions were under way, and Congress has been adding to its home ever since.

However, the additions to be built during the first decade of this century will far surpass anything which preceded them. In the first place, work will shortly be commenced upon a $4,000,000 marble office-building, designed as an annex to the Capitol and connected with it by a great tunnel, in which will be operated a miniature electric railway for the benefit of Congressmen and their friends. In this new office-building, there will be a sufficient number of rooms to give every Representative in Congress a private office. At present, every Senator has a private office, but only a comparatively small proportion of the nearly four hundred Representatives are so provided.

While the new office-building will be depended upon to give the legislators the private offices for which they have long been clamoring, it will not relieve a state of congestion which exists in the Capitol proper. To accomplish this, the present Congress is to be asked to make an appropriation of $2,500,000 to enlarge the great white-domed building. In order to give the law-makers a definite idea of just what they will receive for this big sum of money, a force of workmen is engaged, under the direction of the most expert plaster modeller in the country, in preparing a miniature representation of the Capitol building as it will appear after the addition. Every window and door in the vast building is reproduced faithfully in this mass of plast several yards in length, and after the model (which is costing $7,000) has been exh ited as an object-lesson to the men who hold Uncle Sam's purse-strings, it will taken to the Exposition at St. Louis, in order that the people of the country m gain a conception of the improvement to be undertaken.

In the addition to be built there will be space for a magnificent vestibule, 108 f in length, and for sixty-six rooms, not one of which will be less than twenty-two thirty feet in size. The enlargement of the Capitol is to take the form of an extensi of the East front—that portion of the building facing the Library of Congress, a affording on its broad, front steps the site for the temporary stand which is erect once every four years for the exercises of inaugurating a President. This centr portion of the building is fully twenty feet narrower than the two great wings of t Capitol, which contain the halls of the Senate and House of Representatives, a which were, of course, built many years after the completion of the central portic which constituted the original building. Now the present plan to have this central section of the big structure extended to a li not merely flush with the wings, but fully fifteen feet beyo them. The architects claim that this broadening of the centr portion of the Capitol, far from being incongruous, will, by ding depth and compactness, improve the appearance of the ent building. Moreover, it will provide a larger, broader and mc imposing base for the massive dome.

The new portion of the Capitol will, in general appearance, identical with the old. The project will not involve any alterati of the principal walls of the old historic portion of the Capitol. T present front wall of the old building will remain as a rear wall an open court which will light the west side of the proposed ad tion. The extended front will be faced with a magnificent porti of fluted Corinthian columns, of proportions to dominate the p ticos of the wings. The wings of the Capitol are of white marb but the old or central portion of the building is of scaly sandstor and herein is found another reason why the enlargement will welcomed by all lovers of a beautiful and imposing Capitol. Wh the new portion of the building is erected, the outside will prese a uniform expanse of white marble. WALDON FAWCETT.

A Wonderful Book of Many Travels

"How I Worked My Way Around the World" is a volume full of interest, entertainment and inspiration. Probably never before in history did a sixteen-year-old boy undertake so ambitious a task as Harry Steele Morrison set for himself when he left his home at Mattoon, Ill., to see the world, literally working his way step by step, and crowning his enterprise with audiences with Queen Victoria, Mr. Gladstone, Pope Leo, the President of France, the King of Belgium and with Paul Krueger; returning at last to his native land without debt and with money in pocket. Mr. Morrison is now twenty-two years of age. He has written several books on his various experiences, the first one containing a charming introduction of the red-haired young author by the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew.

His present book, "How I Worked My Way Around the World," tells of all his journeys, from inception to finish, and Russell Sage gives it a send-off in a most hearty and pertinent introduction.

Mr. Morrison, in simple language, without any useless flourishes, takes us from country to country; he pictures the habits and customs of the people, until we can almost imagine ourselves among them; with beautiful pictures, he brings to the very eyes of the reader the sights which he himself has witnessed, and tells us all he knows about them. It is a charmingly interesting volume, which, at the request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he has prepared for our readers, and we consider ourselves fortunate that we can include so meritorious, instructive and entertaining a book among our premium propositions.

This excellent book, beautifully bound in red cloth with emblematic design, consisting of 408 large pages, illustrated with numerous half-tone reproductions of photographs, together with The Christian Herald for one year, at only $2.00. Many a winter's evening by the open fireplace and around the evening lamp, will be spent profitably and pleasantly by old and young, in the perusal of this book of many travels. It measures when open 9 x 15 inches, and is sent all charges prepaid.

Warning to Our Readers

THE Eighth Edition of the Red Letter New Testament is just out. Forty-five Thousand were printed of this edition, and it is hoped that the present supply will meet all the requirements for November and December. This edition of the Red Letter New Testament has been in preparation since last July, and never was this work more beautifully bound. The Red Letter New Testament, issued in both English and German (Swedish now in preparation) is bound in American Levant, with extra lining to edge. It is finished in red under gold, and while the Testament, as a rule, is printed in black, all the words recorded as having been uttered by our Lord appear in Red. The type is the same in both colors, but the moment you see a word in Red you may know that our Lord uttered it. The covers of this Testament overlap; the binding, while substantial, is soft and flexible; the paper is of extra quality; the printing of the best, and the alignment of the Red Words absolutely perfect. The words printed in color are in a dark easily leg ble red, and the entire work is the resu of infinite care and accurate workmanshi

The Red Letter New Testament the original device of Dr. Klopsch. Ther are many imitations, but, like all counte feits, they may be easily detected by th inferior workmanship, and by the nume ous errors which the proverbial careles ness of imitators is apt to produce. N Red Letter New Testament issue elsewhere is worthy of the name, and th fact that three English Bible Societie imitated it, and one of them is now tryin to find an American market for it spurious production, is the best indicatio of the value of this unique Testament.

We offer this superb volume, with Th Christian Herald for one year, for $1.8 while imitations, in smaller type and ir ferior presswork, with poor alignment an shabby binding, are offered, without Th Christian Herald, at $1.25.

Dr. Klopsch considers it his duty t warn our subscribers against the very ir ferior and altogether imperfect editio alluded to above, as it entirely misrepr sents his work and his idea of a genuin Red Letter Testament. If you wish copy of the genuine work, order it to-day
